

Far Rightists In France Win Several Mayoral Seats

But National Front Loses In Other Cities Where It Had Appeared Strong

By William Drozdiak
Washington Post Service

PARIS — French extreme-right candidates won mayoral races in Nice and three other southern towns Sunday, but the anti-immigrant National Front failed to make the dramatic breakthrough across the country that some of its supporters had predicted after a strong showing in the first round last Sunday.

The Front's xenophobic message aroused enough support to help it win the city halls of Toulon, Marignane and Orange. All three towns are in southern France, where the Front has grown rapidly in popularity by capitalizing on voter fears about a threatened surge of immigrants from North Africa.

In addition, Jacques Peyrat, a far-right candidate who quit the Front last year to run as an independent, was elected mayor of Nice, France's fifth-largest city.

But the extreme-right failed to win races in other cities where some of its strongest candidates had appeared poised for victory. The Socialists held off the Front in the southern industrial town of Vitrolles and the eastern city of Mulhouse, while a center-right alliance beat one of the far right's most attractive personalities, Marie-France Stirbois, in the wheat-belt town of Dreux, about 80 kilometers (50 miles) west of Paris.

Even though President Jacques Chirac's governing center-right alliance and the opposition Socialists mobilized enough voters to thwart the Front's ambitions, France's far right demonstrated that it could sustain its political influence with the voters even though virtually all of the country's institutions are now dominated by conservatives.

Jean-Marie Le Pen, the leader of the anti-immigrant party, blamed the "establishment" for whipping up a scare campaign to keep the Front from winning control of several cities and towns. Nonetheless, he expressed satisfaction with the steady growth of his party, which is expected to double its number of city council members across France.

In recent years, the Front has stirred consternation among the mainstream parties by making important inroads in areas where voters have expressed fears about rising crime and an influx of foreigners.

G-7 Talks Show Limits of Power

HALIFAX, Nova Scotia — On a range of issues stretching from the wars in Bosnia and Chechnya to the turbulence in global currency markets, the summit meeting that ended Sunday was a lesson in the limits of power of the world's seven leading industrial nations.

BUENOS AIRES, Russia — Stunned by the failure of two commando raids by elite federal troops, Prime Minister Victor S. Chernomyrdin of Russia ordered a cease-fire in Chechnya on Sunday and sent a high-level negotiation team there in an effort to win the release of hundreds of hostages being held in this Russian town by Chechen fighters.

The immediate cease-fire, the offer of safe passage for the gunmen back to Chechnya and high-level negotiations represented a total reversal of Russian policy in dealing with the hostage-takers and the six-month-old war in that breakaway region.

But the outcome of the negotiations, initiated in publicly televised telephone calls from Mr. Chernomyrdin to Shamil Basayev, leader of the Chechen fighters here, remained in doubt Sunday night after Mr. Basayev decided to put a hold on the deal until early Monday morning, according to the television news program Itogi.

[Mr. Basayev told Mr. Chernomyrdin that he was preparing to leave the hospital, where the hostages are being held, at 5 A.M., Reuters reported.]

Local officials said Mr. Basayev had asked for six buses to take his gunmen, some hostages and a group of parliamentary deputies to the southern Chechen town of Vedeno. The rebels also wanted a refrigerator truck to transport their dead.

[Mr. Chernomyrdin and Mr. Basayev had agreed that all the captives would be released before the rebels were given transportation, but it seemed highly unlikely that the Chechen commander would want to leave without some hostages.]

Nonetheless, the government was moving swiftly to demonstrate that it was serious about finding a peaceful resolution to

Serbs Free Last Captives As UN Agrees to Demands

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Having successfully used terror to secure virtually all their demands, the Bosnian Serbs on Sunday released a last batch of 26 United Nations peacekeepers taken hostage more than three weeks ago.

Apparently in exchange, the United Nations released four Serbs captured May 27 after a battle with French peacekeepers in central Sarajevo. Their release was the final condition set by Radovan Karadzic, the Bosnian Serbs' leader, for freeing all the United Nations hostages.

At the same time, the United Nations force here was allowed to withdraw 91 peacekeepers from weapons-collection sites around Sarajevo where they had been surrounded by the Serbs since May 26. This withdrawal constituted the formal collapse of the combined effort by NATO and the United Nations to police or remove heavy weapons from the Sarajevo area.

Pentagon's Call for Nuclear Testing Splits Clinton Team

By R. Jeffrey Smith
Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON — Some senior Defense Department officials have proposed to renew U.S. underground nuclear tests for the first time since 1992 at levels equivalent to hundreds of tons of TNT, provoking an intense debate inside the Clinton administration, U.S. officials said last week.

The proposal arises out of Pentagon concern that the world will soon agree to ban all nuclear tests, halting forever the 47-year U.S. practice of setting off experimental blasts to test the reliability of existing nuclear arms and develop new models of these powerful weapons.

Officials at the Energy Department and the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency are fighting the plan, with support from independent arms control experts. The critics say it makes a mockery of Washington's pledge at the United Nations last month to support completion of a comprehensive test ban by 1996. Secretary of Defense William J. Perry, Secretary of State Warren M. Christopher, Secretary of Energy Hazel R. O'Leary and other top officials are to discuss the issue at a White House meeting this week, several sources said. But a decision is likely to be postponed until the plan is examined more carefully, they said.

A report by the JASONs, a group of physicists who advise the government on military matters, is due by the end of July. Some officials have also advised holding off a decision until the international furor provoked by France's recent decision to conduct a few more nuclear tests over the next year dies down.

Word of the Defense proposal has stirred concern among foreign diplomats, who last month negotiated the extension of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, which calls on nonnuclear weapons states to forswear acquisition of such arms in exchange for a policy of restraint by the five declared nuclear powers.

The Sri Lankan ambassador, Jayantha Dhanapala, who presided over the conference on the nuclear pact, said at a disarmament conference in Japan last week that there has been "disturbing reports of a Threshold Test Ban Treaty being foisted on us in the guise" of a comprehensive ban. This would allow nuclear blasts below an agreed level.

Mr. Dhanapala said that if such a proposal was put forward by one of the nuclear powers, it would confirm widely held suspicions among nonnuclear states that political expediency lay behind the promise of such a ban.

The internal U.S. dispute originates in President Bill Clinton's decision to endorse the speedy completion of a test ban in a January memorandum outlining U.S. nuclear policy. His memo said that the comprehensive test ban treaty "must not prohibit activities required to maintain the safety and reliability of our nuclear stockpile."

Senior Pentagon officials have cited this passage as justification for inserting a loophole in the test ban treaty allowing nuclear blasts to be conducted by the five declared nuclear powers, which also include Britain, Russia and China, in addition to France. Under one variant, such tests could continue only for a decade.

The stated purpose would be to ensure that existing nuclear arms have not become obsolete.

After an Epoch of Nagging, Christo Wraps Reichstag

By Rick Atkinson
Washington Post Service

BERLIN — Nearly a quarter-century after he first sought permission to swaddle Germany's most controversial building in fabric, the American wrapmaster Christo finally began to convert his vision into art over the weekend as a team of steeplesacks began trussing up the Berlin Reichstag with a million square feet of silver cloth and nine miles of blue rope.

The first of 70 veils of woven polypropylene spilled down an inner courtyard Saturday while Christo's legions swarmed over the once and future German Parliament building, tugging, tussling and wrapping away. But work was short-lived on Sunday, as high winds forced the wrapping to stop. Enveloping the entire building was expected to take four days, but now it may take longer.

The technical director, Wolfgang Volz, said Sunday: "We have been warned that winds may reach a speed of up to 60 kilometers an hour, which means we will not be able to work. We should be able to go ahead tomorrow."

The "Wrapped Reichstag" has long had this town abuzz with anticipation — Berlin schoolchildren have been wrapping everything from pencils to classrooms — and a sizable crowd swarmed around the project Saturday, gawking and opining.

Would-be critics predict the finished product, to be on display for two weeks, will resemble a vast space ship, a silver lame sculpture or, less generously, a diapered hatbox.

"You have so much empty space between the fabric and the building, and that empty space will be filled with the wind," Christo said in an interview. "The wind will make the Reichstag like a living object, like it's breathing."

Whatever the project's aesthetic appeal, it may not prove to be the tourist magnet predicted last winter by Berlin city offi-

Conservatives Resurgent / Deng Too Old for Last Round?

Industrial Reform Is Under Assault in China

By Patrick E. Tyler
New York Times Service

SHENYANG, China — The last great task of Deng Xiaoping's era of economic reform, the restructuring and privatizing of China's huge state-owned industrial sector, is under assault just as he appears to be too infirm to respond.

Since consolidating power in 1978, Mr. Deng, now 90, has supervised each phase of economic liberalization, ending agricultural communes and creating "special economic zones" as experiments in capitalism.

In doing so, he laid the foundation for the "socialist market economy" that became national policy in October 1992 and has accounted for the tenfold increase in China's gross national product from 1978 to 1994.

The greatest remaining challenge near the end of his life has been transforming the state industrial sector. Eighteen months ago, the Communist Party mapped out a blueprint for overhauling 14,000 of China's largest state-owned industrial enterprises by the end of the century. Now, as Mr. Deng's health and influence as China's paramount leader have slipped, almost no progress has been made while conservative ideologues in the party leadership appear to be reversing the strategy.

Many Chinese and Western economists say the overall economic success or failure of China in the coming years will turn on its ability to transform its state-owned industrial sector from a debt-ridden burden into an engine of growth.

Failure to do this, many experts say, could undermine the ability of China to pay its debts and sustain its population of 1.2 billion.

MR. DENG had endorsed the 1993 plan to put China's industrial leviathans on the same footing as Western corporations, responsible only to shareholders — not the party — and the demands of the market.

But allowing bankruptcies in money-losing large industries designated by the provincial authorities early in 1994 has been postponed, and "corporatization" has disappeared from the official vocabulary.

The reason, many Chinese and Western economists say, is that this last stage of reform

A CLOSER LOOK

Industry in Transition

Since 1978, state-owned industries have accounted for a declining proportion of China's gross industrial output. Deng Xiaoping's program to privatize the state industrial sector is running into resistance.

will take an enormous amount of political will to manage the social upheaval caused by large-scale factory closings.

What's more, an assault on the state sector threatens the source of much of the Communist Party's power. Party cadres dominate the management of state industries.

And tax revenues from state factories sustain the central government and the party in Beijing, providing 65 percent of national tax revenues.

The party's political identity is at stake. "What we are engaging in is socialism, and our final goal is to achieve communism," Song Ping huffed in a commentary in People's Daily, the official Communist Party newspaper.

Mr. Song, a 78-year-old conservative party elder, asserted that Mr. Deng's reforms had led to "erosion by the corrupt thinking of capitalism."

Some fear that a strong conservative backlash could stifle — or even roll back — the trend toward more market-based decision making in the management of state-owned factories, where ad hoc money-making strategies and product innovations have demonstrated that a capitalist spirit has taken root within the old system.

In a rare public admonishment to senior Chinese leaders, the U.S. ambassador, J. Stapleton Roy, warned that "the adverse consequences of delaying fundamental reform" in state industries "and not making a stronger commitment to the market would be felt most strongly in the first part of the next century and could jeopardize China's hopes for sharing in the general rise in East Asia's prosperity in the first decades of the next century."

Here in Shenyang and all along the industrial spine of northeastern China, hundreds of thousands of workers have been sent home from state-owned industries whose products are uncompetitive. The euphemism for these layoffs is "taking a long vacation" — without pay.

"Some workers tried to set a statue of Mao Zedong on fire with gasoline," said Xu Ping, 30, an industrial engineer. "That's how angry they were. People with families are seeing their livelihoods disappear and they are asking, 'What kind of workers' state is this?'"

The answer seems to be that it is a state in transition — "poised awkwardly," as Mr. Roy put it recently — between a Marxist centrally planned economy and the "socialist market economy" that Mr. Deng set as a goal.

Where Mr. Deng emphasized the need to take risks with the economy, his designated successor, President Jiang Zemin, has adopted the language of the Deng reforms but carries out the tactics of delay and deferral.

MR. JIANG, a consensus builder, now speaks mostly about the need to maintain social stability and bring down the inflation rate, which last fall reached the highest level since the Communists took power in 1949. It has declined somewhat, but remains alarmingly high.

Breaking up China's state sector carries with it great risks at a time when China's social safety net is largely undeveloped.

China's leaders have looked at the "shock therapy" in Russia and pronounced it a dangerous failure, although many economists argue that Beijing could afford to move aggressively against the state sector.

The reason is that the Chinese economy is booming, with annual growth over 10 percent, on the strength of the performance by nonstate companies and foreign joint ventures.

"China cannot afford to slacken the pace of reform," Harry G. Broadman, a World Bank economist, said in a study. Loss of momentum, he said, could undermine China's "ability to maintain growth."

"Efforts must be made to improve the vitality of the state-owned enterprises by way of deepening the reforms and building up their new superiority," Mr. Jiang said recently, echoing the conservative line.

Mr. Jiang's new emphasis, and that of his economic advisers, is on improving management.

The party's strategy is now based on the tenuous proposition that foreign investors would be interested in collaborating with Communist Party bosses to bring modern technology and management techniques to China's state industries.

Its Riches Wasted, Congo Awakens To Wealth of Debt

By Howard W. French
New York Times Service

BRAZZAVILLE, Congo —

The sandy streets of this river-side capital are just as sleepy as they were 15 years ago, but with more potholes and fewer cars.

Other than a new building here and there, and bullet holes that scar buildings, little jars the memories of a returning visitor.

In most African countries, with their failing economies and booming populations, a rundown capital would not be surprising — indeed, it would be expected. But Congo had been considered a special case.

Brazzaville was the administrative capital of France's Equatorial African empire. It has long boasted some of Africa's best schools and has a literacy rate to rival that of many developed countries.

For Congolese, the discovery of huge offshore oil fields shortly after independence in 1960 seemed to presage a future of nearly limitless promise.

Instead, years of corrupt Marxist leadership and a bloody democratic transition marked by urban ethnic warfare have left Congolese bitter and impoverished.

Though Congo has long been a magnet for young intellectuals in the region, many of its brightest youths have fled.

The oilfields have fulfilled their promise, earning nearly a billion dollars annually on oil exports for a population of scarcely 2 million.

But Congolese are waking up to find that their oilfields are nearing depletion, that the money has not improved the lives of most and that their country is so deeply in debt from borrowing against future oil earnings that it is unable to get credit.

"They are dreadfully mortgaged," said a Western diplomat. "They have been producing 150,000 barrels a day for 10 years, and there is nothing to show for it but a $4 billion debt."

Congolese say their story is one of disastrous waste of an embarrassment of riches. After independence, the country had French-inspired leftist governments for several years.

It formally became a Marxist one-party state in 1970, a little more than a year after power was seized by Captain Marien Ngouabi, a young paratrooper commander, the first of several leftists from the north who would rule the country for the next two decades.

The country was briefly a model of austere communism. But with the rapid expansion of the oil industry in the early 1970s, stakes got higher. Mr. Ngouabi was assassinated in 1977, leading to a takeover by Colonel Denis Sassou-Nguesso.

Although he was adept at the rhetoric of dialectical Marxism and a close friend of the Soviets, he favored sharply cut suits over uniforms. He soon came to be known as a "Cardinal Communist" for his taste in French finery.

For some, these tastes were revealing portents of what was to come. While allowing Eastern-bloc powers to look after national security matters, diplomats say, Mr. Sassou-Nguesso handed over the oil industry to the French company Elf, failing to drive a hard bargain for revenues.

In exchange, he was made a rich man and enjoyed the diplomatic favors of Paris.

In 1991 anemic oil markets caused a near-collapse of the economy. Then, in one of the remarkable episodes of Africa's movement toward democracy, Mr. Sassou-Nguesso acknowledged at a national conference that he had enriched himself and relinquished power.

He kept his money and still lives in the country. The borrowed money had been used for a few prestige projects and had been siphoned off in corruption. Mr. Sassou-Nguesso, in an effort to hold onto power as his popularity faded, nearly doubled the size of the civil service, to more than 80,000, and sharply increased salaries.

Congolese agriculture has declined starkly as a result of failed socialist-era investments and urban migration.

Congo has begun a tentative diversification of its oil relationships, bringing in Occidental Petroleum and other partners to market oil and develop untapped reserves.

Democratic elections in 1992 produced the first southern president since the 1960s, Pascal Lissouba. But accusations of betrayal caused electoral alliances to fray and led to a little-remembered tribal war.

In Congo's tangled politics, the worst tensions have been between closely related southern ethnic groups.

"People were saying the northerners are out, it's our turn to have the most money, the prettiest mistresses and the nicest cars," said Emmanuel Dongala, one of Congo's best-known authors. "Next thing you know, political parties were dissolving to the lowest common denominator, the ethnic group, and southerners were killing each other."

The worst episode was in Brazzaville last year, when government forces moved against the working-class neighborhood of Baongo, the stronghold of one party in the southern conflict, shelling the area. Diplomats estimate that more than 1,000 died.

"We have lived through humiliating scenes of political violence that are the pure product of hatred," said Bernard Kolélas, a Baongo leader. "By now we can all agree that we have served as an example of human folly."

By Eric Pace
New York Times Service

Claire Sterling, 76, an American author and correspondent based in Italy, who was known for her writings on terrorism, assassination and crime, died of colon cancer Saturday in a hospital in Arezzo, Italy. She lived in Cortona.

Mrs. Sterling was based in Italy for more than 30 years and traveled widely. Her most recent book, was "Thieves' World: The Threat of the New Global Network of Organized Crime," published in 1994 by Simon & Schuster. It was praised by Stephen Handelman, of the Harriman Institute of Advanced Soviet Studies at Columbia University, as making "a significant contribution to post-Cold-War debate."

In an earlier book, "Octopus: the Long Reach of the International Sicilian Mafia" (1990), she charged that gangster chiefs based in Palermo had created a multinational empire with the United States as its main target.

In her 1984 book "The Time of the Assassins," Mrs. Sterling examined the attempt by a Turk, Mehmet Ali Agca, to kill Pope John Paul II in 1981. She contended that Mr. Agca had "come to Rome as a professional hit man, hired by a Bulgarian spy ring."

She presented what she called "massive proof that the Soviet Union and its surrogates have provided the weapons, training and sanctuary for a worldwide terror network aimed at the destabilization of Western democratic society."

Mrs. Sterling's contention about a Bulgarian role in the attack was disputed, but in 1991 she wrote that Italian courts in 1988 had "expressed their moral certainty that Bulgaria's secret service was behind the papal shooting."

Luigi Innocenti, 71, Of Lambretta Family

MILAN — Luigi Innocenti, 71, last member of the Italian industrial dynasty that gave the world the Lambretta motor scooter, died June 12, sources close to the family said.

Mr. Innocenti, whose father Ferdinando founded the family automobile company and invented the classic Lambretta in 1947, died in Milan. He was a designer and engineer.

John Atanasoff, 91, Computer Pioneer

John Victor Atanasoff, 91, a physicist whose pioneering computer research in the 1930s was overshadowed by the successes of wartime computers, died of a stroke Thursday in Frederick, Maryland.

Working at Iowa State University in the late 1930s and early 1940s, Mr. Atanasoff and a graduate student, Clifford Berry, invented a digital computing device called the Atanasoff-Berry Computer, or ABC, that could solve a certain type of algebraic problem.

In the 1970s, a federal court ruled that the device was a predecessor of the successful Eniac computer, voiding a crucial patent held by Eniac's inventors and casting doubt on previous accounts of the early days of computing.

Rory Gallagher, 47, an Irish rock and blues guitarist, died Wednesday from post-operative complications after a liver transplant in April. He had collaborated with Howling Wolf and Muddy Waters.

Marcel Sony Labou Tansi, 48, a novelist renowned for his satire and criticism of colonialist Africa and the dictators who followed independence, died Wednesday of AIDS.

E. Bronson Ingram, 63, a billionaire who helped parlay a family oil and gas business into one of the largest privately held companies in the United States, died of cancer Thursday. He was chairman and chief executive officer of Ingram Industries Inc., which Forbes magazine estimated earned $150 million last year on revenues of $6.1 billion.

Len Karpinsky, 66, once a political dissident and editor of the reformist Moscow News weekly, died June 12 at his country home near Moscow.

POLITICAL NOTES

Fund Raising, Republican Style

WASHINGTON — As Republicans intensify the drive to cement their majority in Congress, lawmakers are putting the squeeze on potential donors with a raw aggressiveness unusual even by Washington standards. Several lobbyists said they were stunned by the direct nature of a solicitation they received from Representative Thomas D. DeLay of Texas, the House majority whip.

His letter was mailed to every political action committee that contributed to the losing re-election bid last year of Mike Kreidler, a Washington Democrat. The warning: Contribute to the Republican winner, Representative Randy Tate — and move fast.

"I understand you supported Randy Tate's opponent, Mike Kreidler, with a total contribution of $500 during the 1993-1994 campaign cycle," Mr. DeLay said in one letter. "While I was surprised to see you oppose Randy Tate, you now have the opportunity to work toward a positive future relationship."

Mr. DeLay did not stop there. Not only did he urge donors to change their ways and give to a Republican, he strongly suggested more than once that the political action committees start writing checks immediately — so Mr. Tate could put the money to best use.

The letter is the latest example of an all-out effort by Republicans to keep control of Congress by moving quickly to convince political action committees and other special interests to demonstrate their loyalty. (NYT)

House Swats Down Army Museum

WASHINGTON — House Republicans have delivered a fiscal rebuke to the U.S. Army, voting overwhelmingly against providing $14 million for a museum in Northern Virginia that was a top priority of the service.

The vote came on an amendment to the 1996 appropriations bill for military construction, which was defeated, 261 to 137. A total of 154 Republicans voted to withhold the money, and only 66 sided with the army. The appropriations committee had recommended giving the army $14 million of the $17 million it requested to acquire a future site for the museum on property owned by Marriott Corp.

The outcome suggested that the $10.7 billion military construction measure could face trouble when debate on it continues this week. The appropriation is $2 billion above this year's and exceeds the president's budget request by $500 million. (WFP)

Speaker to Debate on MTV Special

NEW YORK — If he is lucky, no one will ask him what type of underwear he wears. But Newt Gingrich will risk questions of that sort and some of the political variety when he appears on a half-hour MTV news special, "Newt: Raw," on July 13.

Mr. Gingrich and five or six people in their 20s will discuss issues from the Republicans' political agenda to national service, education and the minimum wage. "We asked Newt Gingrich to take part in this program as part of our ongoing efforts to give young people a voice in the political process," said Judy McGrath, president of MTV.

Mr. Gingrich follows in the footsteps of President Bill Clinton, who faced a live MTV audience in June 1992. Mr. Clinton responded to various questions about his administration, as well as to the query, "Do you wear boxers or briefs?" (NYT)

Plunging Into the Campaign Swirl

WASHINGTON — One is a 45-year-old West Point graduate. Another is a 20-year-old college sophomore. A third is a White House veteran at 25 who wants to go back. What they have in common is that they are working in their first presidential campaigns.

They say they cannot understand why others turn up their noses at the hard work and sharp elbows that the competition for high office involves. Andrea Mack, 22, who is coordinating volunteers for Senator Bob Dole, said: "People have the mistaken idea that politics is a closed circle. But those who try it find it is something they love."

For some of the novices, the motivation is ideology. Erin Ann McBride, 20, of Oakton, Virginia, who organizes fund-raisers for Patrick J. Buchanan, the conservative commentator, was taken to her first political rally by her father when she was 2. She was an intern in a congressional office when in high school. But what caused her to drop out of Brigham Young University in May, at least temporarily, and go to work for Mr. Buchanan was her faith in his ideas.

"If you didn't believe in pro-life, pro-family, anti-NAFTA and anti-GATT policies, you wouldn't be for Pat Buchanan," she said. "I know he won't change his views. That's why I'm here."

Similar motivations drive David Peikin, 23, of Bethesda, Maryland. He is an assistant press secretary for Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania. He was working as a researcher at a public relations firm when the job opened up. "I've always admired Senator Specter's stand," he said. "He does a great job on abortion," where Mr. Specter has been on the side of abortion rights, "and in keeping the extreme forces in the Republican Party in check." (WFP)

In Republican 'Revolution,' Decorum Goes to Guillotine

By Helen Dewar
Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON — As often as possible, usually before a nearly empty chamber in the early morning or late evening, Rick Santorum takes the Senate floor with a chart reading "Where's Bill?" — and sends Democrats into a collective rage.

The freshman Pennsylvania senator's defiant use of President Bill Clinton's first name is an attack on one of the decorum-conscious Senate's unwritten taboos, aimed at barring any words that might be construed as expressions of disrespect.

It has also stirred a behind-the-scenes debate among senators over what one called "the proper manners for a revolution."

Mr. Santorum's critics, Democrats all, say his conduct is an example of the coarsening of political discourse in the United States, a coarsening that was reflected in the take-no-prisoners tone of last November's campaign and is exemplified now in the harsh rhetoric of many new Republican lawmakers, especially in the House.

Mr. Santorum and his allies deny there is anything disrespectful about using the president's first name, but contend that provocative language is essential to producing the radical change the voters wanted when they overthrew the established Democratic order last year.

"Sometimes you have to speak up to drive a point home," Mr. Santorum said, adding: "After all, you wouldn't be writing this article if I came to the floor every day and asked, 'Where's Mr. Clinton?'"

Shocking as it has been to some of his Senate colleagues, Mr. Santorum's brash behavior should come as no surprise.

Barely into his 30s when he was elected to the House from a heavily Democratic district in 1990, Mr. Santorum was drawn to his speaker, Newt Gingrich, who was then the Republican whip. He became a high-profile member of the "Gang of Seven" freshmen who helped make the House bank scandal a household term, contributing to the retirement or defeat of dozens of members.

Last year he took on Senator Harris Wofford, whose election three years before had helped put health care reform on the national agenda. But the political tide had taken a sharp right turn, and Mr. Santorum trounced Mr. Wofford by painting him as an out-of-date liberal and railing against big government and high taxes.

Bringing to the Senate the same kind of confrontational conservatism that had marked his brief House career, Mr. Santorum quickly earned a reputation as the most combative member of a highly combative class of 11 freshman Republicans.

The Senate's youngest member, at 37, he has been chastised repeatedly by Democrats, but such criticism seems only to invigorate him.

In his Clinton "vigils," as he calls them, Mr. Santorum has been trying to call attention to what he describes as the president's "lack of leadership" on balancing the budget. He uses a big blue and white chart — with gold numbers reflecting the days that have passed since Republicans on the Senate Budget Committee produced their plan — as a visual prop to dramatize his claim.

He was out on the floor with the chart minutes after Mr. Clinton unveiled his proposal to balance the budget, insisting that it would not do so.

Senate Democrats contend that Mr. Santorum's chart talk, repeated a dozen times over the past month, has called attention to little more than his "bad manners" and disrespectful language.

"I've been in the Senate 21 years," said Wendell H. Ford, the Democratic whip, "and this is the first time I've ever heard the president or first lady referred to by their first names — not Dick, not Jimmy, not Ronnie and not Bill. It's one of the complaints that people have generally about politics, about campaigns of dirt and mud. And it's even more distasteful when it's brought into the Senate chamber."

Senator John B. Breaux, Democrat of Louisiana, said: "This is the kind of thing you hear in high school, not the United States Senate."

Republicans have declined to confront Mr. Santorum. But some have expressed their misgivings in private. "It's a question of manners," one said, but he asked not to be identified.

Senator James M. Jeffords, Republican of Vermont, however, did say of the approach of some of his more conservative colleagues: "I think it's silly and counterproductive, but it seems to turn them on."

Virginia Says Yes to Buchanan
Conservative Writer Sees Straws in the WindBy Peter Baker
Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON — Patrick J. Buchanan has rallied hundreds of supporters to claim victory in a straw poll of presidential candidates among Virginia Republicans that he hopes will give him momentum even as rivals dismiss it as meaningless.

One of the largest rump voting sessions to date in the nascent battle for 1996 Republican presidential nomination, Mr. Buchanan, a conservative journalist, swamped the field by winning 59 percent of the 1,083 votes cast at a fundraiser, party conference Saturday in Tysons Corner. Each Republican who voted paid $25.

Such contests rarely foretell the public's preferences, but they can be morale boosters for lagging campaigns and provide a barometer of sentiment among party activists.

The results also drive home the fact that conservatives are in firm control of the state Republican apparatus.

The Senate majority leader, Bob Dole of Kansas, a moderate who is the front-runner in national polls, collected just 7 percent of the vote. More moderate figures, such as Governor Pete Wilson of California and Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, received less than 1 percent each and were hissed when they were mentioned.

David Johnson, executive director of the state party, said the vote reflects support for Mr. Buchanan but more importantly signals the direction favored by the party faithful.

"They want the party to stick to the issues that the grass roots are concerned about," he said, such as abortion and morality.

"They want the nominee, whoever it turns out to be, to be both a fiscal conservative and a social conservative."

Still, despite the relatively large turnout, the event underscored Virginia's nearly nonexistent role in presidential politics. Although once known as the "mother of presidents" because eight chief executives hailed from the state, Virginia in the modern era has been reduced to a small player.

Of the nine candidates, only Mr. Buchanan, Alan Keyes, who is a radio talk-show host, and a California congressman, Robert K. Dornan, showed up to address the group, while the rest concentrated on more strategic issues, such as New Hampshire, Iowa and Florida. Virginia will not select delegates to the Republican National Convention until next May, long after the nomination battle is likely to have been settled.

"The bottom line is the primary is too doggone late," said Mark Merritt, communications director for a former education secretary, Lamar Alexander, who did not attend and finished last in the tally. "Everybody has to target your resources where it's going to do the most bang for the buck."

Mr. Keyes, who delivered one of his trademark fiery addresses to the crowd, finished second with 11 percent, followed by Senators Phil Gramm of Texas and Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, with 8 percent each. Mr. Dornan received 4 percent, and the rest got just a handful.

Governor George Allen and Attorney General James S. Gilmore 3d, who remain popular among many Republicans, have not chosen favorites so far.

Aping the Gang Culture Can Reap Deadly Results

Adopting the slang and baggy clothes of Los Angeles gangs is costing some nongang members their lives, the police say.

With many suburban kids deciding it's hip to emulate the look and dress of the "gangsta" culture, it is inevitable that confrontations with gang members will take place, according to Jay St. John, a detective with the anti-gang detail.

Out for the evening with his brother and his friends, Ramin Shaolian, 16, was challenged by a gang member.

"Do we look like gang-bangers?" Ramin scoffed.

A few minutes later he was dead, shot from a moving car whose occupants allegedly included his challenger and another gang member and a couple of girl hangers-on. The police say that as the car drove away, someone inside shouted: "Not gang-bangers, huh? Well, you are now!"

The two males allegedly in the car, Elliot (Chocolate) Singletary and Tommy Lee (Ace Capone) Williams, have been charged with murder.

Detective St. John said that with more youths adopting gang clothing and slang, the prospects of deadly confrontations with gang members rise.

"It's cool to be that way," Mr. St. John said. "Many wear that clothing and are challenged a hundred times and nothing happens."

But the 101st time, Chocolate and Ace Capone drive by, then what do you do?"

Short Takes

The Nobel Peace Prize winner Mother Teresa of Calcutta, who was visiting New England last week, is often called a "living saint." Mother Teresa herself has shown discomfort with the description. "It's a coinage she has refused to accept," editor of The Pilot, newspaper of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Boston. "She is even offended by it." In 1982, asked about the "living saint" tag, she said, "Please let me die first."

Richmond, Virginia, once the capital of the Confederacy, banned the young Arthur Ashe from lighted tennis courts because he was black. Now the city planning commission is studying a proposal to place a statue of the tennis and civil rights champion on Monument Avenue, a boulevard lined with granite statues of Confederate heroes. Some whites say they want Monument Avenue to remain a memorial to rebel valor. Black opponents say they are dismayed by the idea of erecting a statue of Mr. Ashe in a neighborhood where he would not have walked. Mr. Ashe died in 1993 at the age of 49 from AIDS contracted when he was given a transfusion of infected blood during a heart operation.

Talking elevators enjoyed a brief vogue when they reached the market in the early 1980s, but have never really caught on. Otis, the world's largest elevator company, says that about 5 percent of its elevators talk. More than half of those have female voices, reassuring passengers when the elevator stops between floors, for example, "Please do not be alarmed. We are experiencing a temporary power interruption." A spokesman for the National Association of Vertical Transportation Professionals opined, "I think it's always much more soothing to hear a female voice than a male voice in a difficult situation."

'Disaster' of O. J. Simpson and the Gloves

By Kenneth B. Noble
New York Times Service

LOS ANGELES — After rugging and squeezing and grinning, O. J. Simpson finally got his hands into the infamous bloodstained leather gloves. But if the jury ultimately concludes after all that they did not fit him, the prosecutors may have decisively undermined what could have been their most powerful piece of incriminating evidence.

In hindsight, lawyers, legal scholars and other experts say, the prosecutors' move last week in getting Mr. Simpson to squeeze into the gloves, which they say he wore in killing Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald L. Goldman, was a horrible mistake, a blunder so grave and damaging to the state's case that it may never recover.

"The jurors seeing that the gloves didn't fit O. J. Simpson changes everything," said Peter Arenella, a criminal-law professor at the University of California at Los Angeles.

"This takes away the momentum of the coroner's emotional testimony," Mr. Arenella said, and will force the prosecutors to try to regain that momentum by seeking to introduce, earlier than they had planned, additional evidence of domestic violence in the Simpson household.

"And it eliminates the need for O. J. Simpson to testify."

Mr. Arenella continued, "In effect, he's already done it."

Gigi Gordon, a Santa Monica criminal-defense lawyer, said the prosecution's tactic had violated a trial lawyer's cardinal rule: Never elicit evidence whose outcome is unknown in advance.

"This was an unmitigated disaster," Ms. Gordon said.

As a result of the striking courtroom demonstration, Ms.

Gordon said, "there's a national debate now on whether that glove fit him."

"And the same debate is going to continue in the jury room," she said. "As a prosecutor, you don't want a debate, you want an edict."

One of Ms. Gordon's colleagues in the local defense bar, Karen Ackerson, agreed. "The jury stopped listening once

O. J. couldn't put the gloves on."

And Linda Meza, a psychologist and jury consultant in San Bernardino, said: "I've never seen a blunder like this. It's a clear example of how a clear, concrete demonstration prevails on jurors. It was clearly more salient than hours and hours of DNA testimony."

Not everyone thought the demonstration so damaging that it would necessarily imperil the prosecution's case.

"We can't assess yet what this is likely to mean, because we are in the middle of the story," said Erwin Chemerinsky, a criminal-law professor at the University of Southern California. "I've seen many experts say this is a pivotal moment. But the prosecution is likely to revisit this issue later, and we'll have to wait until then."

But most trial lawyers and other experts said the prosecution had committed a blunder, and some attributed it to simple incompetence.

"They have 25 lawyers on the case," said Barry Tarlow, a Los Angeles criminal-defense lawyer. "You would think that one of them, with hands roughly the size of Mr. Simpson's, would think of trying the glove on first. A first-year lawyer would have known to do an experiment before trying this in front of the jury."

Sinn Fein Says Peace Talks 'Over,' but Britain Denies It

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches
DUBLIN — Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, formally broke off exploratory peace talks with Britain on Sunday, putting the brakes on a 10-month quest for a political settlement in Northern Ireland.

"Exploratory talks are now over — they're finished," the Sinn Fein strategist, Martin McGuinness, who is de facto No. 2 in the Irish republican party, said in a speech. "The continuation of that process now requires a new realism from the British government."

He roundly rejected Britain's demand that Sinn Fein's IRA guerrilla supporters start handing over their weapons as a condition for being invited to all-party talks aimed at ending the 25-year Northern Ireland conflict.

The British government, however, asserted Sunday that the exploratory talks with Sinn Fein were continuing. "We are still engaged in an exploratory dialogue, and we don't have any reason to believe they are not going to continue," a spokesman for the Northern Ireland minister said.

But they said frustration might boil over on the streets of Northern Ireland if the anniversary approached with little sign of Sinn Fein's being admitted to the talks.

Polish Jews Urge Walesa to Disown Remarks by Priest

By Jane Perlez
New York Times Service

WARSAW — Several prominent Polish Jews have appealed to President Lech Walesa to disassociate himself from anti-Semitic remarks made last week by a Roman Catholic priest while the president sat in the congregation.

Mr. Walesa has declined to comment on a statement by the Reverend Henryk Jankowski during Mass that the "Star of David" is impaled in the swastika as well as the hammer and sickle.

He added: "Poles, hestir yourselves. We can no longer tolerate governments made up of people who have not declared whether they come from Moscow or from Israel."

The priest, who played an important role in the Solidarity movement in the 1980s and who usually officiates at the Sunday Mass the president attends in Gdansk, issued another declaration last Wednesday that further emphasized what he had said.

In his second statement, Father Jankowski said: "The Star of David symbolizes not only the state of Israel but also the Jewish nation. Like all other people, Jews happen to do some noble things in public life just as they happen to do some noble things in private life."

Because Father Jankowski is an important figure in the Roman Catholic Church, his comments moved "anti-Semitism from the margins to the center of Polish politics," said Stanislaw Krajewski, a consultant here to the American Jewish Committee.

Mr. Krajewski appealed to Mr. Walesa to make a clear public statement condemning the priest's words. He also said the church hierarchy should make an official statement rather than the off-the-cuff apologies that senior clergy have made in response to reporters' questions.

The secretary of the Roman Catholic episcopate, Bishop Tadeusz Piatek, distanced the church from the sermon, saying it destroyed "long efforts" at good relations between the church and Judaism.

The silence from Mr. Walesa, who is preparing to run for a second term as president but whose popularity is at a record low, was more troubling, Mr. Krajewski said.

"It is late already — there is nothing from the president," said Mr. Krajewski, who is the Jewish co-chairman of the Polish Council of Christians and Jews. "The later he says something, the weaker it is."

After the priest's second statement, Mr. Walesa's spokesman, Leszek Spalinski, declined to comment.

In an angry commentary in the newspaper Rzeczpospolita, Konstanty Gebert, a well-known Jewish journalist, wrote: "Let us draw conclusions from this incident. Apparently, the highest state and church authorities see nothing wrong in Father Jankowski's statement."

Britain Backs Shell's Plan to Sink Oil Rig

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches
LONDON — Shell U.K. faced increased pressure Sunday over its decision to scuttle an old oil rig off the western coast of Scotland, but the British government fought back on behalf of the oil company.

A flotilla towing the Brent Spar headed through stormy seas to a site off the Hebrides where Shell intends to sink it.

The environmental group Greenpeace said the rig still carried the same amount of oil as a small tanker and might also contain chemical waste that could leak out and pollute the sea. Shell denied that and contends that sinking the rig is the best way to get rid of it.

Clinging to the rig were two Greenpeace activists. On Saturday, a Greenpeace helicopter had to dodge water jets fired from nearby ships to drop them.

"They're prepared to go down with the Brent Spar," a Greenpeace spokeswoman said. She said the oil company's attempt to prevent the helicopter from approaching the rig was an "outrage." "It appears the water cannon were not just forming a protective curtain," she said, "but were trained on the helicopter as it flew around the Spar."

He said Greenpeace's demand that the rig be taken apart

Q &amp; A: To Veterans of '50s Beat Movement, 'It's Still Going On'

In the 1950s, Lawrence Ferlinghetti founded the City Lights bookshop in San Francisco, which became the meeting place for the beat writers and political activists of the 1950s and 1960s. In Florence to participate in a beat revival at the Teatro Studio of Scandicci, he talked with Ken Schulman.

Q. Critics and scholars have grouped all of the beat writers together into a single unit. Did you perceive of yourselves as a movement?

A. Allen Ginsberg did. Without Allen there wouldn't have been any beat movement. Not only is he a genius poet, but he is a genius publicist. From the very beginning, he knew exactly what would happen. And he was also smart enough to document it in his photography.

Actually, I wasn't one of the original beat group. When they were horsing around at Columbia University and Times Square, I was in Paris living with a French family and working on a doctorate.

Q. If the beats were in fact a movement, what were they moving against?

A. These were the McCarthy years, you know. It was a little like the situation today. Poetry was very academic and hermetic. Poetry Chicago was the leading poetry journal, and that was pretty tame. When the beats came along, there was a whole new ball game. It was sort of like when rock hit the music scene in the 1960s. Cool jazz went right out the window.

Q. Was it only a literary movement?

A. There was definitely a political basis. Allen came out of a Jewish radical leftist background. And the beats in general were articulating for the first time what became the main themes of the hippie counterculture in the 1960s. The first ecological consciousness, the first anti-war pacifism. And the first use of psychedelic drugs to enlarge consciousness.

Q. What was the failure of the movement?

A. Who said it failed? It's still going on. There are beat revivals all over the world. And except for Kerouac, all of us are still around, and still writing. We didn't become the legislators of the world, if that's what you mean.

Q. But wasn't there a bit of naïveté in the movement, in the belief that you could change the world?

A. I don't think that anyone was all that worried about trying to change the world. The beats were more intent on making out than in changing the world. And as I wrote in one of my poems, they made out of madness a hundred years of beatitude.

There is a huge rejuvenation of the beats in academic circles these days. But everything is done so seriously and self-consciously. This wasn't a movement of academics. But the academics have not gotten hold of it, and it has become way too heavy.

Q. Was it easier to take sides in the 1950s and 1960s than it is today?

A. Definitely. In 1955, Life magazine wrote that the beats were the only rebellion around. Well you could say that this is still the case. If you look at American writing or American painting today, you don't find rebellion. How long has it been since a major American writer said anything of great importance from a dissenting point of view. I don't hear them saying anything.

Q. What could they say? What causes could they rally around?

A. Cyberspace and computers, for one. The new cold war is the war against the electronic revolution. They could draw a line between the human and the nonhuman. The computer revolution is just now being questioned by a lot of intellectuals who were originally hooked on computers.

Virtual reality creates a pretty sticky quality of life. If Dante were around today, he would probably invent a 10th circle of hell that is paved with television monitors and computer screens.

Q. Is there no one examining these themes in the arts?

A. There are a few dissenters. Rap poets and singers. Performance poets. They are working in the same dissident tradition that the beats worked in. There is still a protest against the dominant consumer culture. Only today I find them far more alienated than we ever were. Everything has to be politically correct today. But there doesn't seem to be any real commitment out there.

Q. Was there in the 1960s?

A. People went to jail back then. And not just young people. I spent 19 days in the can. The problem was that the counterculture was ingested into the middle class. All of the symbols, the music, the posters, the style of dress, they were absorbed by the system. This is the enormous capacity of the consumer society to ingest its most dissident elements.

Moroccan-EU Fish Talks 'Frozen'

RABAT, Morocco — Negotiations to renew a fishing treaty between the European Union and Morocco were "frozen" over the weekend as the EU's fishing chief ended talks in Morocco without making any progress on setting a date for further discussions.

"The two sides' positions are still too far apart, and it has been judged that conditions don't exist to set a date for a new round of negotiations," said the EU fisheries commissioner, Emma Bonino. However, although the situation was frozen, she said, "The doors are not closed."

Miss Bonino met with Fisheries Minister Mustafa Sahel and Prime Minister Abdellatif Filali during her two-day visit in an attempt to set a date for a sixth round to negotiate EU fishing in Moroccan waters. (AP)

Belgian Parties Agree on Program

BRUSSELS — The two Christian Democrat and two Socialist parties in Belgium's outgoing coalition agreed on a program Sunday that will form the basis for their next government.

"The negotiations are finished, there is a definitive agreement on a final version of the text," a spokeswoman for Prime Minister Jean-Luc Dehaene said. Mr. Dehaene headed the team that negotiated the new center-left government following last month's general election and is poised to become prime minister again.

The four parties — the Flemish Christian Democrats, Flemish Socialists, the French-speaking Christian Democrats and French-speaking Socialists — agreed in principle on Saturday to form a new government. Details of the planned government program were not available, but an earlier version made public said the fight against unemployment would be the "absolute priority." (Reuters)

Spain Jails Ex-Intelligence Aide

MADRID — A former senior military intelligence official was jailed Sunday as the prime suspect in a scandal over electronic eavesdropping that has caused a national outcry against the government of Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez.

Military police arrested Juan Alberto Perote, the former clandestine operations chief of the CESID intelligence service, at his home outside Madrid before dawn Sunday on charges of revealing state secrets.

Government officials pointed last week to Mr. Perote as the person most likely responsible for leaking CESID's recordings of telephone conversations of some of Spain's best-known figures, including King Juan Carlos I and the Real Madrid soccer team president, Ramon Mendoza. Mr. Perote, in an interview published Sunday by the conservative daily ABC, denied having leaked the recordings and said his superiors never gave orders to monitor the king's calls. (AP)

Major's Hold on Power Questioned

LONDON — Prime Minister John Major returned from a Group of Seven summit meeting in Canada on Sunday to find his Conservative Party more openly rebellious than ever, heightening speculation about whether he can cling to power.

The party's "Euro-skeptic" faction, unhappy at Mr. Major's policies toward the European Union and plans for a single European currency, renewed their insurrection, while a cabinet minister joined the ranks of those who would replace him. Mr. Major acknowledged his problem as he left the G-7 summit meeting in Halifax, Nova Scotia. "If anybody wishes to challenge for leadership of the Tory Party, there is a constitutional procedure for doing so. We will wait and see whether they do," he said.

Britain's Sunday newspapers carried front-page speculation about how much longer Mr. Major could stay in power. The Sunday Times said in an editorial that Mr. Major should ask to advance the date of the party's annual leadership election from November to next month. "If the government is to survive he must restore his authority fast," it said. (Reuters)

Charles and Diana Reported To Agree Not to Divorce

LONDON — A British newspaper reported Sunday that Princess Diana and her estranged husband Prince Charles had agreed not to divorce for the sake of their children.

The Sunday Express, quoting "royal insiders," said the agreement would also allow Diana to be crowned queen when Charles takes the throne.

"One cannot yet talk in terms of a total reconciliation — there is a very long distance to travel before that can be achieved," one senior adviser was quoted by the newspaper as saying. "But there has certainly been a very definite change of attitude on both sides."

But a Buckingham Palace spokesman said: "This is no more than speculation."

Prince Charles and Princess Diana officially separated in December 1992, 11 years after their wedding in London's St. Paul's Cathedral.

Airborne Pollen Heralds Big Year in Morocco — for Marijuana

By Marlies Simons
New York Times Service

MADRID — Scientists sampling the air in southern Spain the other day came across a surprising event, a great stream of marijuana pollen coming off the Mediterranean waters, carried by a warm southern wind.

The pollen, though invisible to the naked eye, was measured along a 400-kilometer (250-mile) stretch of the Spanish coast, from Estepona to Cartagena, and it reached more than 160 kilometers inland, beyond Cordoba.

"This is exceptional," said Eugenio Dominguez, coordinator of Spain's Network for Aerobiology, which detected the particles. "We've never measured marijuana pollen in so many places."

Researchers soon established that the tiny grains appearing in their microscopes were barbed, like a likely bumper crop of marijuana in Morocco, to the south. At this time of the year, they said, the great marijuana plantations are in flower along the north coast between Tangiers and the Algerian border.

"No, you don't get high breathing this," Mr. Dominguez said by telephone from Cordoba, where he is a biology professor. "We'd all be very cheerful by now, but the pollen does not contain the narcotic compound."

The wafts of pollen are also a reminder of a reality that many European officials have preferred to overlook: that Morocco is the largest supplier of marijuana to Europe and one of the world's leading hashish producers. Most of the country's marijuana crop is converted to hashish, its resin concentrate.

Because of Europe's huge appetite for the thin-leafed plant, Moroccan farmers have multiplied their crop tenfold in the last two decades.

In public, European governments have said little about Morocco's marijuana trade. The reluctance stems partly from the need to remain on good terms with the country's leader, King Hassan II, at a time of mounting instability in neighboring Algeria.

Officials monitoring the drug trade recognize that marijuana earns foreign currency for Moroccan farmers, and that without it the large number of immigrants heading to Western Europe would be even larger.

In private, though, European Union governments have pleaded with the king and his cabinet to curtail the crops and to clamp down on exports. The king reportedly agreed, and in 1992 he announced an eradication campaign against kif, as the plant is known locally. But Morocco still largely turns a blind eye to the subject.

One important part of the equation, diplomats and police officials in Spain and France concede, is Europe's own ambivalent attitude toward so-called soft drugs.

While pressing Morocco and other drug producers and offering them aid to promote substitute crops, some European governments emit conflicting signals by removing penalties for the use of soft drugs and even tolerating production.

In 1994, after an independent study concluded that Morocco's hashish production had reached a record high of 1,500 tons a year, an EU delegation went to Morocco to ask its government for a more serious crackdown. Its main concern, the delegation said, was that the Moroccan hashish network in Europe was also being used by cocaine and heroin traders.

Morocco replied that if it were to comply, it would want more European aid in exchange, said an official familiar with the visit, who put Morocco's current hashish earnings at more than $2 billion a year.

Besides, the Europeans were asked, did it make sense to eradicate a crop that sooner or later might become entirely acceptable in Europe?

In the Netherlands, hundreds of soft-drug cafes openly sell hashish and marijuana, and Dutch plant breeders are growing such large amounts of cannabis in greenhouses that insiders predict that the Dutch may soon be self-sufficient.

Morocco's reply that it would want more European aid in exchange, said an official familiar

Summit Leaders Warn Yeltsin On Use of Military in Chechnya

By David E. Sanger
New York Times Service

HALIFAX, Nova Scotia — Leaders of the seven major industrial nations issued a double-pronged warning to President Boris N. Yeltsin of Russia, telling him that the "situation in Chechnya should not be resolved by military means" and indirectly condemning his government's planned sale of nuclear reactors to Iran.

But in an agitated mood at a meeting with President Bill Clinton, Mr. Yeltsin called Chechnya "the center of world terrorism, of bribery and corruption and mafia."

Raising his hands in the air, he said General Dzhokar M. Dudayev, the Chechen rebel leader, had applied for political asylum in Turkey.

But Michael McCurry, Mr. Clinton's spokesman, said the United States had "no evidence" that Mr. Dudayev had sought or received asylum.

Mr. Yeltsin first lashed out about Chechnya in response to a Russian television reporter, who asked Mr. Clinton whether he was changing his mind about the Chechens because of the seizure of a hospital in southern Russia. Before he could answer, Mr. Yeltsin broke in to say that he himself was a hostage to the crisis, and that "my friend Bill" supported Russian action to suppress the rebellion.

"General Dudayev has asked Turkey to provide him with political protection, and Turkey has agreed," Mr. Yeltsin said later, his voice rising. "We don't care where he goes, as long as it is far, far away from Russia."

But Mr. Clinton, who sat impassively during Mr. Yeltsin's first outburst, took pains to say he differed with Mr. Yeltsin's characterization of his position on the conflict and said all terrorism had to be denounced.

The statements came at the end of a three-day summit meeting whose subjects ranged from reforming the world's main economic institutions to wrangling over how to pay for a rapid-reaction force in Bosnia. But the concluding statement, in which Russia joined, the language on Iran was far more muted, and there was no mention of Chechnya.

Mr. Yeltsin scored a small victory when he persuaded the leaders here to join in a separate summit meeting next year in Russia on nuclear safety issues.

The leaders also created a task force on transnational organized crime, declaring that such crime is "a growing threat to the security of our nations" and to financial markets and emerging democracies. The task force is to report back at next year's meeting, in France.

The leaders told Mr. Yeltsin, who had been so eager to take part here that the Canadian hosts had to give him explicit instructions not to show up until late Friday afternoon, that they were not ready to accept Russia as a full member of a new Group of Eight. A senior administration official said the rest of the group was ready to accept Russia's membership "as soon as it's practical, but no specific commitment was made along those lines."

Part of the problem is that the Group of Seven industrial nations was first intended to be a meeting of great economic powers. And so far, Russia's economy hardly qualifies, even though its political import — and its moves to adjust to capitalist realities — have been a dominant theme of six successive summit meetings.

The seven leaders and Mr. Yeltsin spent much of their time Saturday talking about Bosnia, but they came up with no new proposals save for Mr. Yeltsin's offer that he was willing to use whatever influence he has left with the Serbs in Belgrade to end the conflict.

Perhaps Mr. Yeltsin's most welcome pronouncement was that the Russian economy, after years of shrinkage, had hit bottom and was beginning to grow. He predicted that after several years of shrinkage the economy is likely to record some modest growth this year, with its gross national product rising about 1 percent.

"The prevailing view was that there was real visible progress in Russia," Treasury Secretary Robert E. Rubin told reporters.

HALIFAX: G-7 Summit a Lesson in Limits of Power

opportunity with Mr. Clinton to gesticulate wildly and stage a rambling verbal attack on his enemies in Chechnya.

The summiters devoted a few hours on Friday to discussing the world economy, the ostensible focus of the G-7's "economic summit." And while they are said to have examined the dangers of a brief recession in the United States and a banking crisis in Japan, their communiqué skipped lightly over any problems, noting that "there has been some slowing" of economic growth and predicting that all would soon be well again.

Another manifestation of the limits of G-7 power was the delicate subject of the dollar's weakness against the Japanese yen and the Deutsche mark. Most leaders recognized there was little they could do beyond keeping to prudent economic policies at home.

France's newly installed President Jacques Chirac, in one of several rhetorical bursts that characterized his rambunctious debut on the world stage, derided currency speculation as "the AIDS of the world economy." Some G-7 officials derided Mr. Chirac's remarks.

The G-7 communiqué offered a rather more sober pledge of continued cooperation in foreign exchange markets, while Prime Minister Lamberto Dini of Italy disclosed that G-7 leaders did not even discuss any new ways to tackle turbulence in currency markets.

Mr. Major was perhaps the bluntest in admitting the G-7's relative impotence in currency matters.

"If you took the foreign exchange reserves of all the G-7 nations and put them together, they still would be but a small portion of the daily turnover on the New York market," he said on Saturday. "I won't say there is nothing that can be done, but I would say it is on the margin."

Despite the sense of Halifax being a talkfest, the G-7 did manage to get some important if unspectacular work done in charting reforms that could help safeguard the stability of the international financial system in the future.

The meeting in its compared favorably with the last few do-nothing annual summits, and on the financial front it could even be chalked up as a modest success.

For example, Mr. Clinton did succeed in getting his G-7 partners to approve a plan to create an emergency fund, totaling as much as $54 billion, which the International Monetary Fund could use in future Mexican-style financial crises.

That is a doubling of currently available money, and it will require a passing of the hat to perhaps a dozen Asian and European countries as far flung as Thailand and Singapore or Austria and Sweden.

Mr. Clinton himself will probably have trouble getting the Republican-controlled Congress to approve new U.S. money for the bail-out fund, even though it would have no impact whatsoever on the federal budget. But the IMF's resources are now likely to be strengthened, and that represents progress.

Just as importantly, the G-7 is nudging the rather secretive and overly bureaucratic IMF, and the countries it serves, toward a culture of more transparency and financial disclosure. The reasoning here, which is both logical and compelling, is that the more information financial markets receive, the less likely they are to be shocked and trigger a crisis via a sudden shift in capital.

Another of the actions by the G-7 was to press ahead with plans to help the world's poorest debtor nations. This is definitely not a headline grabber, but it will contribute toward global economic stability in years to come.

Likewise, the G-7 has set out a blueprint for the reform of several agencies of the United Nations, which marks its 50th anniversary this year. Among the more concrete aims, both spoken and unspoken, is the elimination of overlap and in some cases of entire agencies such as the UN Conference on Trade and Development, an agency whose existence is regarded as unnecessary even by many Third World countries, now that they belong to the World Trade Organization.

The Halifax summit also agreed to offer what some officials privately termed a politically valuable present to Mr. Chirac — another high-level G-7 meeting on unemployment, an issue that was at the center of the French president's electoral campaign. The leaders agreed to hold a conference on the jobs crisis in France in 1996, although it is hard to imagine any new initiatives.

Finally, the limits of power were apparent as some of the Europeans displayed their distaste for Mr. Clinton's threat of sanctions against Japanese car sales in the United States, which will be imposed on June 28 if no accord is reached.

Mr. Clinton and Prime Minister Tomichi Murayama of Japan have told their negotiators to try and resolve the dispute over autos and auto parts. But they kept the issue away from the glare of publicity at Halifax, preferring to allow lower-level officials to discuss the matter in secret so they can resume the hard talking again this Thursday in Geneva.

MOSCOW: Russia Halts Fighting in Deal for Hostages

the hostage crisis, which began last Wednesday when Mr. Basayev and a group of about 100 Chechen gunmen stormed into this town, killing and wounding dozens of civilians and policemen, before hoing up in the main hospital here with perhaps 1,300 hostages.

At 7:15 P.M. Sunday, a delegation dispatched by the Kremlin arrived in the bombed-out Chechen capital of Grozny. Its members said they were empowered to do everything possible, including meeting with the Chechen leader Dzhokar Dudayev in his mountain hideout, to try and bring peace to the region. Deputy Nationalities Minister Vyacheslav Mikhailov, head of the delegation, told reporters that negotiations would begin Monday morning and that as soon as the hostages were freed, Mr. Basayev and his fighters would be given free passage, with "complete safety, to any region of Chechnya."

At the same time, the Russian military commander of Chechnya, Interior Ministry Anatoli Kulikov, ordered his troops to halt all military operations as of 8 P.M. Sunday.

President Boris N. Yeltsin, returning from a meeting with leaders of the world's top industrial democracies in Halifax, Nova Scotia, was shown on television this evening accusing the hostage-takers of "unprecedented acts of cruelty," but urging restraint. "Revenge will not soothe grief, but only makes it worse," he said. Mr. Yeltsin urged local authorities to be on guard for future terrorist attacks.

The government's decision to negotiate with the hostage-takers came after two attacks Saturday by crack Russian Alpha Group troops set the hospital ablaze, left at least 20 hostages dead and dozens wounded, but failed to dislodge the rebels. The Russians managed to free perhaps 200 to 300 of the hostages, but hundreds more remained in captivity.

"I declare in front of the press that all military actions in Chechnya will be halted," Mr. Chernomyrdin, seated at his desk in the Russian White House, told Mr. Basayev in one of the four telephone conversations — at least two of them televised — that the two men had Sunday.

Later, in a conversation that was not televised but whose transcript was released, the prime minister told Mr. Basayev, "You can leave whenever you want. Just let the women and children go." And, he warned him, "The longer this goes on, the harder it will be for me to hold people back."

Mr. Basayev answered that it had gotten too late in the day, that there had been too many delays from the Russian side in getting buses and other things together. "I don't believe you and my guys don't believe you," the shooting is continuing," the Chechen fighter told Mr. Chernomyrdin. "We will not let anyone go tonight. I am sorry I let the others go."

It was not certain if the deal held out a realistic chance of achieving peace in Chechnya or an end to the hostage crisis. It offered an end to combat activity, but made no mention of a pullout by Russian forces from Chechnya.

What seemed clear was that the desperate raid by Mr. Basayev, a bearded 30-year-old whose daring is legendary among his followers, had achieved what the Chechens could not in six months of war with Russia: force Moscow to engage in high-level talks.

Moreover, the public spectacle of the prime minister of Russia being impelled to negotiate on the airwaves with a man the Kremlin has publicly branded a terrorist seems a sign that the government has given up on a military solution to the hostage crisis, at least for now.

In a press conference in the hospital late Saturday, Mr. Basayev declared that if Moscow's war in Chechnya was not terrorism, "then this isn't either."

FRANCE: National Front Wins First Mayoral Races

who are accused of taking jobs from native French workers.

The National Front stunned much of France's political establishment last month when Mr. Le Pen won 15 percent of the votes in the first round of the presidential election.

Even though the party has been deprived of any seats in Parliament, the outcome of the municipal elections showed the far right continues to expand its support in the south and in border areas where many immigrants have settled.

The mainstream parties sought to block the National Front's growing influence by stealing some of its rhetoric and emphasizing the fight against crime and illegal immigration. After the first round of voting last Sunday, the opposition Socialists withdrew their candidates in favor of conservative candidates who were better placed to defeat the National Front.

But the center-right ruling alliance refused to reciprocate in several towns where the Front scored well in the first round, prompting the Socialists to claim that Mr. Chirac's Gaullist party and its centrist partners were more interested in thwarting any gains by the democratic left than in stopping the far right.

In some of the biggest cities, the elections served as a test of political health for some of the country's top politicians.

Prime Minister Alain Juppé confirmed his popularity by winning election as mayor of Bordeaux. Mr. Juppé has spent his entire career in the shadow of Mr. Chirac, and his bid to establish a new municipal power base was considered an important step to bolster his status as Mr. Chirac's likely heir apparent.

According to early results, former Prime Minister Raymond Barre appeared headed for victory as the new mayor of Lyon, France's second-largest city. But former President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing suffered a serious blow to his prestige, losing a bid to oust the longtime Socialist mayor of Clermont-Ferrand in central France.

The Socialist Party claimed it had embarked on the road to recovery with some noteworthy gains after its humiliation in legislative elections two years ago, when nearly 80 percent of parliamentary seats passed into the hands of the center right.

Former Justice Minister Michel Vauzelle, a close ally of former President François Mitterrand's, was elected mayor of the southern city of Arles, and former Culture Minister Jack Lang managed to retain his office in Blois.

But Mr. Chirac's supporters also found reason to cheer. A government coalition took control of Marseille for the first time since 1952 and captured another traditional Socialist stronghold in Avignon.

Jean Tiberi, Mr. Chirac's appointed successor as mayor of Paris, was confirmed by voters in the capital.

forecast, "it will be $10 or $11 million."

His "Wrapped Reichstag" proposal was rejected repeatedly by the German government during a 24-year epoch that saw the end of the Cold War, the reunification of Germany and a vote by the Bonn Parliament to move back to Berlin later this decade.

Meanwhile, their work continued apace, including the wrapping of the Pont Neuf bridge in Paris in 1985 and the 1983 encirclement of 11 islands in Miami's Biscayne Bay with nearly 7 miles (11 kilometers) of floating, pink plastic.

Dogsness paid off in February 1994, when Parliament voted, 292 to 223, to permit the wrapping, despite objections from Chancellor Helmut Kohl and others who felt the project would sully the Reichstag who are accused of taking jobs from native French workers.

tricity for almost a month. Shortly after the shelling, middle-aged women could be seen awkwardly trying to move quickly as they maneuvered wheelbarrows full of containers of water through the suburb. The scene, like many in this city, appeared to be lifted from some monstrous camp where human dignity is no more than a faint memory. Dobrinja was built in happier times, to house athletes at the 1984 winter Olympics.

It was a similar, if more murderous, shelling incident, at the Sarajevo market in February, 1994, that led to the creation of the United Nations weapons-collection sites abandoned today. The wheel has thus come full circle after a brief season of hope.

The 26 hostages released Sunday by Dr. Karadzic included 11 Canadians and 15 United Nations military observers of various nationalities.

Like the more than 200 hostages released in three earlier batches, the peacekeepers were put on buses to the Serbian capital of Belgrade.

The United Nations had insisted on their unconditional release. But in the three weeks since their capture, Yasushi Akashi, the top United Nations official here, has issued a statement saying the force here will adhere strictly to peacekeeping principles — tantamount to saying that the use of force, particularly NATO air strikes, is no longer envisaged.

This was the first demand set by Mr. Karadzic for the release of all the United Nations hostages.

The second was the release of the four Serbs captured after they and other Serbian forces donned stolen United Nations uniforms to seize a French peacekeeping post. The incident led to the death of two French peacekeepers when they decided to fight back and retake the Vrbanja bridge position in central Sarajevo.

On Sunday, the United Nations duly bowed to this second request, handing over the four Serbs to the International Committee of the Red Cross, which in turn escorted them into Serbian-held territory.

The conclusion of the hostage affair came as Sarajevo lived through another day of ordinary misery and terror. The streets are still largely deserted, and stores closed, after a Bosnian offensive that made headway on Thursday and Friday but now appears to have proved more limited than President Alija Izetbegovic initially suggested.

The Bosnian army has gained some territory to the north and south of the city, getting close enough to Serbian-held roads to intercept them with gunfire. But the prevention of the strangulation of Sarajevo, promised by President Izetbegovic, has not yet been achieved.

Two Whites Stabbed By Blacks in Lisbon

The Associated Press

LISBON — Two white men were stabbed by a group of eight to 10 blacks in what police say might have been a racially motivated attack following a black youth's death at the hands of skinheads the previous weekend.

The group approached the victims near a red-light district of Lisbon, stabbing one of the men in the abdomen and the other in the face and arms before fleeing through a subway tunnel Saturday night.

Australians Clash With Police at Rally Over Nuclear Tests

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches

CANBERRA, Australia — About 500 people who oppose France's decision to conduct nuclear tests in the South Pacific staged a rowdy and sometimes violent demonstration outside the French Embassy on Sunday.

Three men were arrested when they broke through a line of police. Dozens of others scuffled with officers as organizers urged them to invade the compound.

It was the biggest anti-French protest since President Jacques Chirac announced Tuesday that France would conduct eight tests in Polynesia beginning in September.

Meanwhile, the police have confirmed that arsonists started a fire that razed the French Consulate in the western city of Perth before dawn Saturday.

A special police task force has been set up following angry demands by France for justice.

The protest in Canberra broke up after demonstrators left the embassy and marched to the home of Prime Minister Paul Keating, where they demanded that Australia invoke strong sanctions against France.

In Sydney, a group of French nationals living in Australia also demonstrated outside that city's consulate against Mr. Chirac's decision. They asked Australians not to vent their anger on them. Some said they have been harassed and regularly insulted.

France's ambassador, Dominique Girard, described the Perth consulate firebombing as an "unjustifiable criminal act which could have had tragic consequences."

The fire gutted the office of France's honorary consul, Robert Pearce, an Australian citizen who also used the building as a medical clinic. He described the fire as "terrorism."

A previously unknown group, the Pacific Popular Front, later claimed responsibility for the blaze, which witnesses said started with a series of explosions.

Mr. Keating, who has harshly criticized France, also denounced the attack as un-Australian.

South Pacific nations, concerned about possible environmental effects, have criticized the decision to break the testing moratorium introduced in 1992 by Mr. Chirac's predecessor, President François Mitterrand.

Mr. Chirac says the tests on the atolls of Mururoa and Fangataua will be the last but that the decision to resume testing is irrevocable.

Foreign Minister Gareth Evans of Australia will lead a delegation of South Pacific leaders to Paris on Monday to try to persuade the French government to reconsider.

In Germany, the new leader of the junior party in Chancellor Helmut Kohl's coalition sharply criticized the French decision. In issuing the criticism, Wolfgang Gerhardt distanced himself from Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel, whom Mr. Gerhardt replaced as chairman of the Free Democratic Party on June 9.

Mr. Kinkel and other senior German government officials have declined to criticize the French decision, although it goes against the grain of German disarmament policy.

"This decision is a setback for efforts at a common European foreign and security policy," Mr. Gerhardt said in an interview with the Bild am Sonntag newspaper. "Atomic testing was part of the Cold War and is not appropriate in a time of disarmament and environmental protection."

come defective because of old age and to ensure that nuclear blasts can be used to check repairs of unanticipated safety defects. But even supporters of such tests acknowledge that these purposes would be hard to verify and that the blasts would incidentally produce data applicable to work on new weaponry.

Although the blasts in question — with a force comparable to 300 to 500 tons of TNT — would be far less powerful than the bombs that exploded in Japan 50 years ago, they would fall within the range of previous U.S. tests that contributed to weapons development.

The value of renewing such tests was debated in secret on June 1 and 2 by weapons experts from the Department of Energy and the Department of Defense. They met in Omaha at the headquarters of the U.S. Strategic Command, the custodian of the U.S. nuclear arsenal of more than 7,000 weapons.

But three officials said the participants were unable to reach agreement on how important such tests might be to ensuring the safety and reliability of the existing stockpile.

Moreover, no attempt was made at the meeting to consider other goals spelled out in Mr. Clinton's memorandum, including the need to curb "further proliferation of nuclear weapons" and to negotiate a test ban treaty that "as many nations as possible" will sign.

Israel and PLO to Miss Target Date

New York Times Service

JERUSALEM — With time running out, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told his cabinet Sunday that Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization would miss a July 1 target date for a full agreement on expansion of Palestinian self-rule in the West Bank.

Mr. Rabin reported at the weekly cabinet meeting that it would not be possible to resolve all differences over an Israeli Army pullback and security arrangements for Jewish settlements by the target date, said the cabinet secretary, Shmuel Hoz.

Mr. Rabin set no new timetable for an accord, but there was no sign that either Israel or the PLO would stop their negotiations.

Wars in the Old West

A sample of recent bulletins from America's Old West: Mootana rewrites some of the country's strongest water pollution laws as a favor to the mining industry. Idaho lawmakers award potential polluters a major voice in setting standards for clean water. Utah's governor rebuffs the stated wishes of Utah's citizens to set aside 5.7 million acres (2.3 million hectares) of state land as protected wilderness. Washington state's legislature passes the nation's most far-reaching "takings" law, weakening essential land-use controls. Wyoming's legislature authorizes a bounty on wolves, which were recently reintroduced into Yellowstone National Park and are protected under the federal Endangered Species Act. Clearly, the U.S. Congress is not the only place where laws protecting the environment are under siege. Throughout the West, particularly in the Rocky Mountains, state legislatures and governors, egged on by commercial interests and by small but noisy groups of property-rights advocates, are engaged in full-scale mutiny against federal and state regulations meant to protect what is left of America's natural resources. What we are seeing is an updated but more ominous version of the Sagebrush Rebellion of the early Reagan years. That revolt was dominated by ranching interests protesting federal regulation of public lands. The present explosion embraces not only those familiar despoilers but mining companies, timber barons, developers, big commercial farmers and virtually anyone else who stands to profit from relaxation of environmental controls. The environmentalists in Congress on basic environmental protections have much in common. First, both are being driven and in some cases underwritten by big business. Second, both are being waged to save the "little guy" from federal tyranny. Third, this alleged little guy is nowhere to be found when the time comes to draft crippling legislation. Indeed, his wishes have been largely ignored. Poll after poll suggests that what ordinary citizens want is more environmental protection if it means a cleaner environment and a healthier society. But that is not what this Congress and the Western allies want to give them. Montana and Idaho are particularly sad cases. Despite citizen complaints, and virtually unanimous editorial opposition, two bills whistled through the Montana Legislature that would in effect permit higher levels of toxic wastes to reach the state's streams and lakes. They were signed, with some reluctance, by the governor. Mining lobbyists were conspicuous during the parliamentary maneuvering — including representatives from Crown Butte and its Canadian parent, Noranda Inc. These companies are working relentlessly for permission to build in geologically precarious terrain a gold mine that would leave a permanent reservoir of pollutants in the watershed of one of Montana's most important wilderness streams. Idaho's people — not to mention its endangered Snake River salmon — face a double threat. Under a new statute, acceptable water quality levels will be set by watershed advisory groups. These groups will be well stocked with large landowners and representatives from timber, mining and agribusiness companies, who are virtually certain to write new and more permissive regulations. Meanwhile, back in Washington, Senator Dirk Kempthorne, Republican of Idaho, is leading the Senate charge to cripple the Endangered Species Act, which provides what little protection the salmon have. If Mr. Kempthorne succeeds in transferring protection of endangered species from Washington to Boise, it will be goodbye salmon, with grizzlies and wolves to follow. There are, of course, boorable exceptions. In Colorado, for example, ranchers, environmentalists and state officials were able to agree on less destructive grazing practices — although it took a half dozen or so exhausting visits from Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt to get the agreement. But nearly everywhere one turns the anti-Washington ideologies seem to have the upper hand. The most conspicuous example is Nevada, where officials in Nye County passed a series of ordinances claiming ownership of federal lands and then set about physically intimidating employees from the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management. The Justice Department has now sued to reaffirm federal jurisdiction, but Nye County's rebels have inspired imitators. More than 70 rural Western counties have passed or proposed laws to "take back" the public lands. Lost in all the rhetoric about individualism and states' rights is one basic legal fact: At no time have the Western public lands belonged to the states. They were acquired by treaty, conquest or purchase by the federal government acting on behalf of all the citizens of the United States. Lost, too, is a colossal irony. Western ranchers have traditionally fed well at the trough of federal beneficence. In their war against Washington, they are hitting the hand that has fed them lavish subsidies and protected them against disasters of nature and the vagaries of the marketplace. But all of this escapes the Sons of Sagebrushers. The fact that there might be an overriding national interest in preserving the public lands and forests from exploitation is not something that quickly pops to their minds. Nor does this fact seem to register with the newer breed of rebels in the statehouses and state legislatures who would nullify more than two decades of struggle to clean America's waterways, preserve its wetlands and otherwise protect its dwindling natural heritage. There can be no satisfaction in any of this — except perhaps to the enemies of the environment in a Congress that is well on its way to abandoning any pretense to national stewardship. — THE NEW YORK TIMES.

Clumsy Amendment

The U.S. Senate's overwhelming 84-16 vote for an amendment banning obscenity and indecency in on-line communications made a peculiar conclusion to a week in which political figures assailing violence and indecency in popular culture took care to stipulate at every opportunity that they were not calling for any form of government censorship. Unlike these careful critics, and unlike the many cases in which the cry of "censorship" is carelessly raised, the "communications decency" amendment sponsored by Senators James Exon and Dan Coats amounts to censorship in the genuine and sweeping sense. Whatever happens to the telecommunications bill as a whole, the Exon-Coats amendment should not be a part of it. This is true even though the amendment was intended simply to protect minors from encountering indecent material as society ventures into a new medium that contains some undeniably cheesy sectors. Because the Exon-Coats amendment was modeled on older laws regulating obscenity and indecency in print and broadcast communications, it gives the impression of striking a careful balance, as those laws tried to do, between protecting children and restricting the free speech of consenting adults. But the new technology is so different from print and broadcast that the balancing doesn't work. The clause was written without bearing on the new technologies and without a full appreciation of how differently they work. If passed, the law would heavily penalize, jail or fine anyone who "knowingly transmits" or "knowingly makes available" indecent content to someone under 18. But on the Internet, the traditional distinction between a sender and a receiver of information doesn't hold; to "post" anything anywhere, in America or abroad, "makes it available" to millions of unidentified users who may get to it by a variety of technical routes and then make a copy for their own use. Material can thus be "received" without anybody "sending" it. Carrier services like CompuServe or America Online, which provide the technical access that allows this wandering and copying to take place, can exercise some control but not complete control over what is transmitted by them or to whom. In response to their complaints that they would be liable unless they screened every single message, an untenable proposition given the volume of traffic, lawmakers tried to build in defenses that would protect them from obscenity prosecution. But since some of the services involve selecting materials, there is reason to expect that those defenses might not hold up in court. The House bill may include a far more sensible approach to on-line obscenity, modeled on one that Senator Pat Leahy tried and failed to attach to the Senate bill. It would fully study ways to protect minors from Internet smut at the receiving end, including software that would enable parents to filter out certain types of material directly at the terminal. Such technologies are already available. That is a far better approach than this clumsy ban. — THE WASHINGTON POST.

Important Dirty Work for the U.S. Army

By Stephen S. Rosenfeld

WASHINGTON — What everyone who peers into the post-Cold War mists has been struggling to see is a true passage from familiar old-type national-interest threats, ones that required heavy commitments and heavy weapons, to new-type post-Cold War threats that require ... well, what? That's where many of us are hung up now. But not Major Ralph Peters of the U.S. Army. Few have been more provocative or more diligent in pursuit of large and difficult truths than this former enlisted man, a best-selling novelist and currently a Pentagon intelligence analyst. He makes a strong and clarifying case for radical policy review in the summer issue of Parameters, the quarterly of the Army War College. The military's abiding fascination with the marvelous new Iraq-proven technology troubles Major Peters. He fears it will produce "the most expensive white elephant in the history of mankind," and writes: "We are preparing for the war we want to fight some day, not for the conflicts we cannot avoid ... The real threats we face imply a new lease on life for skilled infantry and an enduring need for special operations forces." The "unavoidable" conflicts he would prepare for arise from what he fairly describes as an unremarkable development — the pervasive weakening of the nation-state. "From Colombia to Russia, traditional structures of government coexist nervously with emerging systems of resource allocation and human organization, from techno-capable crime networks to the machete-swinging clans of warlords, from Russian anarchy-capitalism through economic migrations to the re-emergence of the city-state in places such as Cali, Sarajevo and Kabul." Abroad, Major Peters suggests, the American model of civil-military relations in which the military looks outward and law-enforcement agencies tend to domestic order is buckling under pressures to confront the more powerful state-challenging criminal and terrorist organizations and "criminal enterprise armies." At home, use of the military appears inevitable to him, "at least on our borders and in some urban environments." Major Peters would end "citizen-equivalent judicial treatment" of those foreign criminals who "have had a far more savage effect upon our country and its people than Saddam Hussein ever brought off ... The goal is not to try them in a court of law, but to kill them until the survivors quit." He decries the U.S. military's reluctance to join the war on drugs, which he attributes to a fear of failure. He would dutifully prepare for the traditionally "military" missions, plus the new one of missile defense. But he would be ready to engage with drugs and crime, terrorism, peacekeeping, illegal immigration, disease control, resource protection, impounding nuclear materials, "attempting to alter the patterns of Haitian collective behavior" and the like. The grand rationale: "A military's reason for being is to do its nation's dirty work." "This is a terribly changed and rapidly changing world," he concludes. "The U.S. armed forces must change with that world, and must change in ways that are fundamental — a new human understanding of our environment would be far more use than any number of brilliant machines." It's always helpful for us civilians to be reminded that the military makes space for challengers of the conventional wisdom. The bureaucratic, budget-protecting, careerist side of the military is rarely lacking for public exposure. It is good to find the intellectually adventurous policy side getting in its licks. Not that Major Peters is everywhere on mark. His readiness to suspend "citizen-equivalent judicial treatment" is nutty. He has a streak of vigilantism. Perhaps some of those nation-states whose decline he is prepared to compensate for can still be revived. Most important, though, is that his call to extend defense from vital interests to America's dirty work is not coming from a quarter that can be dismissed as hostile and ideological or amateur and uninformed. Quite the contrary. Hear out Major Peters: "I personally love the army as it is, valuing its ethos, its rectitude, its invigorating routine, its respect for our heritage ... Selfishly, I do not want my army to change, and my secret fantasies run more to Sherman at Shiloh than to tracking desperate, malnourished and terrified economic refugees. "I wish that the military that might descend safely from the [revolution in military technology] could be the sole answer to our nation's security challenges, but I cannot find grounds to believe it. "It is a miserable prospect to be an officer faced with the need to argue in favor of filthy missions that will never entirely succeed and which will lead endless ammunition to those who loathe the institution that has given growth to my life. I wish that it could be otherwise." The Washington Post.

Sound Irish Policy, Had He Known When to Stop

By Thomas L. Friedman

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — Whenever you ask British officials about the Clinton administration's decision last year to grant a visa to Gerry Adams, the Irish Republican Army's political leader, you get this pained expression and then some version of the question: "How would you Americans like it if we gave a reception at 10 Downing Street for Timothy McVeigh and a few of his pals?" The discussion usually descends from there into a venomous diatribe about how President Bill Clinton, in his quest for Irish-American votes, fell prey to a Kennedy-clan conspiracy. At that point, if you're smart, you'll mumble something about the weather in London being unusually rainy this year and shift the conversation to European Union agricultural policy. Yes, the British were deeply upset with Mr. Clinton's Northern Ireland diplomacy. Yes, that diplomacy was motivated largely by a Clinton desire to gain favor with the 40 million voters of Irish descent. And yet, Mr. Clinton's decision to give Mr. Adams a visa in return for his commitment to a cease-fire may also have been the president's most original and successful foray into foreign affairs. After all, it has helped engineer the longest truce in Northern Ireland in 25 years. What are the lessons here? The first is a simple reminder that more often than not diplomatic breakthroughs happen when key players do the right thing for the wrong reasons in the right place at the right time. Maybe Mr. Clinton's motives were wrong, but his timing was exquisite. My sense from interviews here is that the British were so emotionally scarred by their years in Belfast that they had lost sight of just how deeply the Catholic and Protestant communities wanted to end the fighting and just how much that sentiment had been communicated to the hard men conducting the street war. By offering Mr. Adams a visa and American legitimization, Mr. Clinton gave him the cover he needed to persuade his hard-liners to yield to the public's desire to move to the bargaining table. Mr. Clinton has "Larry Kinged" Adams, which the Oxford English Dictionary defines as "a verb meaning to transform a fighter into a respectable world figure by giving him the opportunity for repeated interviews on CNN." Britain was unable or unwilling to give Mr. Adams that kind of opportunity and therefore it could not nurture this historic moment to halt the fighting. There is another lesson. When domestic politics drives foreign policy, the danger is an administration will not know when to stop. This is particularly true when the absence of an overriding Soviet threat makes it much easier for Washington to snub traditional allies, like Britain, in pursuit of domestic politics. Last March, U.S. officials tried to build on their cease-fire success by persuading Mr. Adams to begin talks with Britain on giving up IRA weapons. In return, the administration said it would grant Mr. Adams the opportunity to raise funds in America. But Mr. Adams would make only a fuzzy commitment on weapons — one that did not impress London and one which Washington would never have let Yasser Arafat get away with. So what happened? Mr. Clinton, spurred on by IRA supporters, gave Mr. Adams the fund-raising concession anyway, and a White House visit, arguing that this would help Mr. Adams come around. It hasn't. The cease-fire is holding, but the peace talks are now stuck on this weapons issue. Mr. Clinton squandered an opportunity to force a breakthrough. It is not the first time the administration has shown it doesn't know where to draw the line between politics and diplomacy. Last April, Mr. Clinton announced his decision to impose a full economic embargo on Iran. It was the right thing to do. But Mr. Clinton could not resist making the announcement at a World Jewish Congress dinner, while wearing a yarmulke. It left the impression with the Iranians, the Muslim world and the allies that the U.S. embargo was not a fundamental American and global interest, but was just pandering to a single U.S. interest group and therefore not to be taken seriously. Every administration introduces crass domestic politics into foreign policy. But you have to know when to stop. In diplomacy, the road to success is often paved with bad intentions. But so is the road to ruin. Wisdom is knowing where the fork is. The New York Times.

For Europe, Contradictions Argue for Flexibility

By William Pfaff

KREMS, Austria — The contradictions in Europe's unification plans finally are being admitted, as the countries committed to the Maastricht treaty program for federal integration of Europe prepare for the intergovernmental conference next year that will reappraise the Maastricht measures. The contradictions were apparent at a government-sponsored meeting just held in this regional capital, marking the anniversary of the Austrian referendum vote last June to join the European Union. The expression here of the Austrian government's ambivalent European integration, the ruling Christian Democrats now say that any common foreign policy must be subject to qualified majority voting and that no individual state should be expected to send troops or matériel if it doesn't want to. Yet the CDU also wants the Union to move from being an association based upon treaty relationships to a constitutional union. Again an apparent contradiction. France, the other engine of federal union, now is led by a party traditionally committed to a "Europe of Nations," and is reluctant even fully to apply the Schengen agreement on free movement within European borders. Austria attempts to reconcile these contradictions through the notion of "differentiated integration." All should strive toward integration even if they can't currently manage it. Different rates of integration should be the exception rather than the rule. The ultimate goal should be the same for all. Differences must not be allowed which would give one country a competitive advantage "through environmental or social dumping" — a transparent allusion to Britain's rejection of the European Social Charter, concerning wages and labor protection. And there should be no permanent division between "classes" of member countries (another allusion, this time to the German CDU's idea of a core Europe of countries committed to full integration surrounded by others more loosely linked to the Union). These formulas provide a satisfactory verbal reconciliation of the irreconcilable, but whether so impressive a demi-miracle can be produced in the material world must await an answer. The effort is likely to incorporate more exceptions than most Europeans now expect. However, that could prove the better answer, producing the more flexible union, stronger for its flexibility. ### On Taiwan: Why Rock the Boat?

By Burton Levin

HONG KONG — The deterioration of U.S.-Chinese relations has reached the point where some in the U.S. political system want to use Taiwan as a weapon against China. Some human rights activists in America contrast Taiwanese democracy with Chinese authoritarianism in arguing for U.S. support for Taiwan. There are those on the political right, like Senator Jesse Helms, who still believe that China is evil incarnate, Communist dictatorship at its worst. They support Taiwan, too, not recognizing that communism died in China long before it did in the former Soviet Union. There is also a prospect that many in the middle ground of U.S. politics will support Taiwan's right of self-determination. The Clinton administration has clung to a one-China policy and is seriously concerned at the growing attachment to Taiwan in America. Unfortunately, administration policies have created a potentially dangerous situation. The Chinese are prickly not only over U.S. harangues on human rights but because of America's perceived effort to deny them a chance to host the Olympic Games. Many well-educated Chinese say they have great affection for their country's leaders but still strongly condemn the U.S. stand on the Olympics as an insult to their national pride. China is also still smarting over the halting and searching of one of its ships in international waters by U.S. naval vessels, a search that found nothing compromising. Nor has Beijing forgotten the sale by the Bush administration of F-16 fighter jets to Taiwan. China, as a result, increasingly feels suspicious of U.S. intentions. This mood is reflected in Beijing's rhetoric and actions, which in turn further irritate Washington. But too many Americans fail to realize that it is U.S. actions that have produced the jettishable Chinese behavior. It would be the greatest folly for America, Taiwan and China if the United States were to get directly involved in the Taiwan issue. For two decades, Washington has kept largely clear of this. It is that time, Taiwan has prospered and become a more independent state, for the same time, Taipei and Beijing have, in their subtle ways, woven an intricate network of mutually beneficial dealings. The Taiwan-China relationship is not problem-free. But what is a satisfactory status quo that could be upset by a U.S. intervention driven by political passion and lack of knowledge. It is true that China deals poorly with other countries. Perhaps traditional ways of thinking combined with inward, suspicious attitudes of the Communist period have left the Chinese unable to engage in an easy, informal dialogue with America or Japan. High-level meetings with Beijing are usually stiff, and short on meaningful communication. China also deals poorly with the tremendous mistrust and suspicion it arouses in the region. The Chinese cling to their secretive ways and tend to see conspiracy all around, particularly when the United States is involved. A concerted international effort is needed to bring China more fully into the international system. Regional nations need to be more frank about the concerns their imposing neighbor inspires. Asia's future will depend heavily on how the three major powers involved in the region — China, the United States and Japan — relate to each other. America should take the lead in trying to build a trilateral structure to promote regular and effective contact among them. The writer, a former U.S. diplomat who heads the Hong Kong Office of the Asia Society, contributed this column to the International Herald Tribune.

Heading for more exceptions than Europeans expect.

tions for Europe would seem an effort to reconcile irreconcilables. Still, interesting suggestions were offered as to how such a miracle might be produced. The Austrian government says it wants rapid European expansion to the east. It also wants a rapid "deepening" of European Union institutions with an increasing shift of sovereignty from national governments toward reformed Brussels institutions. How can both these things be done at the same time? Each tends to create obstacles to the other. Austria wants "leaner and more efficient decision-making and legislative procedures with majority voting as the rule" in Europe, with a "strong and in-

HAMBURG — Prince Bismarck does not believe that the Franco-Russian alliance deserves that name. (It is all a flirtation, not an alliance.)

NEW YORK — Mrs. Nathan Straus donated to-day [June 18] all her jewels, including many heirlooms, to the Zionist Organization of America for the development of a medical health service in Palestine. The announcement was made at the same time by Rabbi Wise of a contribution by Mr. Straus of $100,000. The valuation on Mrs. Straus' gift is placed at $18,500, but this does not take into account the sentimental value she attached to the gems.

1945: Language Feat
SAN FRANCISCO — Faced with the greatest single task of interpretation and translation in diplomatic history, the United Nations Conference on International Organization expects to have disposed of some three thousand documents in five official languages before the world security meeting ends. Despite preparation by the United States, Great Britain, Soviet Russia and China, as sponsors of the conference, the interpretation and translation bureau of the secretariat did not fully realize the immensity of the undertaking until after its director had arrived in San Francisco. In part, this was owing to the conference decision to have not only English and French as official diplomatic languages, but also Spanish, Russian and Chinese.

CAREERS

Trailing Spouses Get the Chance to Re-Create Their Careers Abroad

By Barbara Rosen
Special to the Herald Tribune

BRUSSELS — They are called "trailing spouses." They are the husbands or, more typically, wives of expatriates relocated by their employers. Increasingly, companies have learned to take into account their professional needs as well as their personal and social ones, even as companies make fewer international moves.

But to a large extent, these spouses are still on their own alone to face not only the social and cultural isolation such moves can bring, but also the loss of professional gratification, the sense of self-worth many found in their work.

Specialists say the solution may lie largely within — in rethinking and maybe re-creating a career, in looking afresh at one's abilities and one's idea of "work."

The barriers to working abroad posed by language, legality and differing qualifications can seem — and sometimes are — insurmountable. Needing, and getting, a work permit varies by country and by profession. In Britain, for example, the spouse of an expatriate employee often has wider working rights than the employee does. In Switzerland, work permits are granted at a cantonal level and are rarely granted to expatriate spouses. There, as in Kenya, some even need permission to work as volunteers.

Within the European Union, nationals of member states have a universal right to work, and various guidelines make it easier for those in legally regulated professions — ranging from doctors to dental assistants to hairdressers to grave-diggers — to get their qualifications recognized. The right to work extends to non-EU spouses, but the qualification guidelines usually do not.

"I can work, but I can't work in my chosen field," said Corinne Witter, 29, a Canadian nurse married to a British accountant in Brussels. After working as a nurse for seven years in Canada, Mrs. Witter compiled every paper she could think of and submitted them to the Belgian authorities.

Almost a year later, the authorities have recognized some of her qualifications. "They recognized me to work as an orderly," she said.

Desperate to work, she embarked on a post-graduate management studies program with an eye to a job in a pharmaceutical or cosmetics company, a route she intends to follow even after she and her husband leave Belgium in January.

People who counsel trailing spouses encourage them to be open to such career changes. One American tax lawyer received permission to work in Brussels as an independent legal consultant. A German travel executive followed his wife to Britain and, seven months later, landed a job organizing exhibitions between Britain and Germany.

"Think of yourself as a basket of skills," said Vicki de Klerk-Rubin, editor of "American Women and Work Overseas," published by the Federation of American Women's Clubs Overseas.

Mrs. de Klerk-Rubin, 38, was a theater manager and financial adviser in the United States, and found a job managing a theater company's finances when she moved to Amsterdam. When her Dutch husband was transferred to Vienna, she organized European lecture tours for her mother, a therapist, then she became certified as a therapist herself. Back in the Netherlands, she took a first-aid course. Now she's halfway through nursing school.

"Had I said to myself 'I am a theater manager,' I would have been stuck," she said.

"Women who are trailing spouses are in the enviable position of not having to work for money," she said. "I'd never blame that they can't get a job on the work rules of a country. No one's going to hand them a job."

"It may be a back door, and it may not be the job that they had in mind," she said, but "there is always a way."

Still, finding that way, and the will, is not easy.

"Moral support — that's probably the main thing that we offer," says Debra Winterson, a founding partner of Career Relocations in London, which has been hired by such companies as British Petroleum Co. and Johnson Wax, a unit of S.C.

Johnson & Son Inc., to help trailing spouses. Another major task, Ms. Winterson said, is convincing employers to take on people who know they'll be leaving in the short term.

One British woman gave up a high-powered job in the financial sector to trail in Brussels. Being in the EU, she was legally able to pursue a new job. But "what really hit her was complete loss of self-esteem," said Susan Wild, director of community relations and member services for Focus Career Services, a nonprofit career resource center. "The shock of just being at home wondering what on earth to do was hard."

"She'd always felt herself to be a professional person, in charge of her life," Ms. Wild said. "She could cope. And suddenly, she couldn't cope."

Often, accompanying partners must face the fact that they cannot work as they had hoped in their new home, but they cringe at the thought of not working at all. Fewer than half of the 375 members of Focus have a full-time job.

"A number of those people will end up as Focus volunteers," Ms. Wild said.

Many spouses find their overseas st as professionally and personally enrich as their partners do. Mariette Rees-1 gielsen, 34, had always wanted to bra out from teaching in Dutch village scho and she jumped when Nissan Europe offered her husband a job two years Tokyo. There, her skills dovetailed wit strong demand for English-language e cation.

"I accepted three jobs the first mont she said. Nissan helped with the pap work because it is simpler to get a w permit for a second family member. Spokeswoman said, Back in Holland, M Rees-Magelsen will apply to internatio schools once her young twins are settl. "I've got a lot more to offer now," she sa.

Some spouses opt willingly for a profl sionary pause to study or to care for sm children. At Spouses Trailing Under D Press Successfully, a Brussels group of reh cated husbands who meet for lunch a golf, member Al Wolf does not see a morale problems among his 30-odd c-borts, half of whom care for young kids.

Markets Ponder if Slowdown Is Real

By Carl Gewirtz
International Herald Tribune

PARIS — "Apprehensive" is the key word in international bond and currency markets. Operators in both arenas have to decide whether the slowdown to near-zero U.S. growth in the second quarter is nothing more than an air pocket — implying no change in U.S. monetary policy — or the harbinger of a recession and further reductions in administered interest rates.

A reduction in U.S. interest rates that is not coordinated with a rate cut in Germany could badly undermine the dollar, experts warn. At present, the dollar is trapped in a trading range against both the Deutsche mark and the yen, and analysts have no clear view on whether the next big move is a surge in the dollar's strength or a plunge testing its historic lows.

This week, analysts agree, the currency market will be dominated by uncertainty over the outcome of the U.S.-Japanese trade talks in Geneva aimed at opening the Japanese market and eliminating the threat of U.S. sanctions on Japanese imports.

Avishar Persaud at J.P. Morgan in London warned that awaiting the outcome of those talks would "prevent aggressive position-taking" and keep exchange rates confined to the recent trading range.

Neil Mackinnon at Citibank argued that a resolution of the dispute could push the yen higher as continued Japanese exports to the United States keep Japan's trade surplus intact. Imposition of sanctions, he added, could weaken the dollar by feeding market suspicions that Washington will revert to a cheap-dollar policy as a means of exerting pressure on Japan.

The conventional wisdom among investors appears to be that imposition of sanctions or any meaningful concession on the part of the Japanese would boost the dollar," said John Lipsky at Salomon Brothers in New York. But, he added, "it's difficult to predict with any confidence the likely market reaction to any of the potential outcomes."

Moreover, analysts agree, exchange markets are likely to trade cautiously out of fear that the Group of Seven industrialized countries could stage another round of concerted intervention to put some muscle behind the lackluster communiqué issued after their annual meeting last week in Halifax.

The fundamental question, however, is where U.S. interest rates are heading.

The arguments for viewing the current economic slowdown as a pause are strong. The incentive to borrow — whether to finance business investment, home purchases or an automobile — is also strong.

Market interest rates have declined substantially this year, thanks to the powerful rally in the bond market. Borrowing charges have declined nearly 2 percentage points between two and five years and are down 1.7 percentage points at 10 years and 1.3 points at 30 years — strong incentives for industry and consumers to build and buy on credit.

The dollar has also declined this year — 15 percent against the yen and 11 percent against the Deutsche mark — significantly enhancing the price competition of U.S.-made products and enabling industry to win back a bigger share of export markets.

But with the third quarter not even underway, it is pure speculation as to whether this logic will overcome the economy's loss of momentum in the current quarter.

The difficulty about relying on logic is that the severity of the current slowdown was unforeseen. This raises worrisome questions about whether, in an ever more integrated world, policy now affects economie performance in ways that are not yet understood.

A more mundane explanation for the severity of the slowdown is that the Federal Reserve Board has badly misjudged the underlying rate of inflation at close to 4 percent instead of a rate that may be below 3 percent.

Analysts assume that the "neutral" level for the Fed-managed cost of overnight money is inflation plus two percentage points. Normally, this federal funds rate — currently 6 percent — sets the base from which market rates are scaled up. So if core inflation is below 3 percent, fed funds at 6 percent may be exerting a degree of restraint that the Fed never intended.

While it is important to understand what is happening to the U.S. economy, institutional investors have an even more pressing obligation: to maximize their profits in the reporting period that ends next week.

Analysts report that fund managers, in particular, were late to jump into the bond market rally and, after chasing markets on the way, these investors are expected to be anxious to take and book their profits rather than carry big positions over the reporting period.

The dollar-bond market is viewed as most vulnerable because a Fed rate reduction is already built in to prices. "The U.S. market is acutely dependent on data that reinforce expectations of a rate cut," said Malcolm Roberts, an analyst in London for Union Bank of Switzerland, who added, "The time has come to take profits."

European markets, which usually take their cue from New York, are highly dependent on expectations of a rate cut from the Bundesbank. But since the German central bank's council does not meet again until mid-July, there is little chance of immediate gratification.

Word of the Fed to Set Tone for Bonds

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches

NEW YORK — Shifting expectations about whether the Federal Reserve Board will lower interest rates is likely to keep Treasury bond prices fluctuating this week as investors look for clues on the central bank's policy.

The outlook for Fed policy "has been the big theme in the market for the last week and it is likely to remain the theme next week," said Ward McCarthy, a managing director at Stone & McCarthy Research Associates.

The Federal Open Market Committee's next meeting is scheduled for July 5 and 6.

The short-term U.S. debt market has priced in an easing of U.S. interest rates because statistics show economic growth continued to slow in the second quarter.

But the expectations for a rate cut have been challenged by predictions from Fed officials that the slide in interest rates so far will result in stronger growth later this year.

The benchmark 30-year Treasury bond finished on Friday with a yield of 6.61 percent, down from 6.72 percent the previous week.

Bond prices rallied throughout the week with the biggest move coming on Tuesday, when the yield dropped 15 basis points, to 6.55 percent, after the government said retail sales rose 0.2 percent in May, less than expected.

But remarks by Alan Greenspan, the Fed chairman, and other central bank officials sent different signals about prospects for a rate cut.

On Thursday, bonds fell after the Fed vice chairman, Alan Blinder, repeated the view expressed by some of his colleagues that the economic slowdown would be temporary and that "something close to normal growth" would follow.

But Mr. Blinder's comments later that he was "concerned" about the slowing economic growth during recent months suggested to traders that he might favor a rate cut in July.

Economic reports scheduled for this week include housing starts for May, which will be released Tuesday, and the trade balance for April, due out Wednesday. On Friday, the government will report on durable goods orders for May.

But analysts said most of the data were not current enough to have an impact on the Federal Reserve's policy decisions. Instead, traders will be listening for more comments from Fed officials.

Tony Crescenzi, head of fixed-income trading at Miller, Tabak, Hirsch & Co., said the mixed signals from the Fed were likely to be negative for bonds because the market needs to have a clear view of the economy.

Investors Are Wary of Orange County

Bloomberg Business News

SANTA ANA, California — Some investors balked at buying Orange County's $295 million in insured bankruptcy recovery bonds last week, saying the securities were too risky.

While an MBIA Inc. insurance policy guarantees repayment of the debt, some investors said they were turned off by the county's plan to delay payment of $800 million in notes maturing this summer.

"The consensus is that you weren't getting enough yield to compensate for the risk" that problems could arise with these securities, said Thomas Spalding, who manages tax-exempt securities for John Nuveen & Co.

Orange County filed for bankruptcy Dec. 6 after its investment pool lost $1.7 billion on risky investments.

The new bonds yielded as much as 0.25 percentage point more than other insured securities on Tuesday, when Orange County began its first debt sale since declaring bankruptcy.

The higher yield cost the county an extra $737,000 in annual borrowing costs. It paid $11 million for the MBIA insurance policy, which was necessary to attract investors.

Meanwhile, Orange County has won court approval to fully repay holders of $175 million of notes maturing in two weeks, over the objections of other noteholders and employees of the bankrupt county.

The so-called Teeter notes will be redeemed when they mature on June 30 with the proceeds of a new $155 million, 20- to 25-year maturity Teeter bond issue, to be sold by the county in about a week. Teeters are secured by delinquent property tax payments.

Holders of $140 million in other county notes objected to the Teeter redemption, saying it was unfair to single out the Teeters for repayment.

Newspapers on the Net: Think Local, Act Global

By Brad Spurgeon
Special to the Herald Tribune

PARIS — Thanks to the Internet, a growing number of travelers and expatriates no longer have to subscribe to their local papers to get the latest news and gossip from home. Entirely supported by advertising, newspapers are using the Information Highway to reach readers wherever they may be.

The offerings range from some of the leading American and British dailies to the Joong-ang Daily News of South Korea, the Gazeta Wyborcza of Poland and the Milford Cabinet, serving southern New Hampshire since 1802.

One thing these papers have in common is that they are free to users, except for phone and Internet connection charges. Some offer nearly the full text of a newspaper, while others provide little more than an Internet advertisement for the publication, along with phone numbers to the subscription department.

Often newspapers take advantage of the multimedia part of the Internet called the World Wide Web to offer at least some of their graphics, like news columns and photos, on the Net to attract readers. Many are using their Netpages to offer news and services that they do not publish on paper for lack of space. All a reader needs is an Internet connection and a Web-browsing program.

Among the larger papers, The New York Times is an example of a publication doing a bit of all the above. It recently set up a Web page at <http://nytimes.com> that provides free daily TimesFax product, an eight-page condensed version of the current day's newspaper. On the Web this is delivered as a file that may be read using a program called Acrobat. The service provides this program free, allowing you to see and print out a version of The Times that looks more like a newspaper than a Web page.

While the service gives readers the news in a nutshell, it does have its disadvantages. Pat Clifford, an American who works in a software development company in Surrey, England, says he usually has to make several efforts daily before succeeding at downloading the large TimesFax file, which cannot be viewed until it is complete. He does not give up, however, because "I am a native New Yorker, and I love The Times," he says.

This week the Times Web site added connections to several other departments that are not offered in the newspaper. One of them, Computer News Daily, provides the full text of articles on computing from several other newspapers and news services.

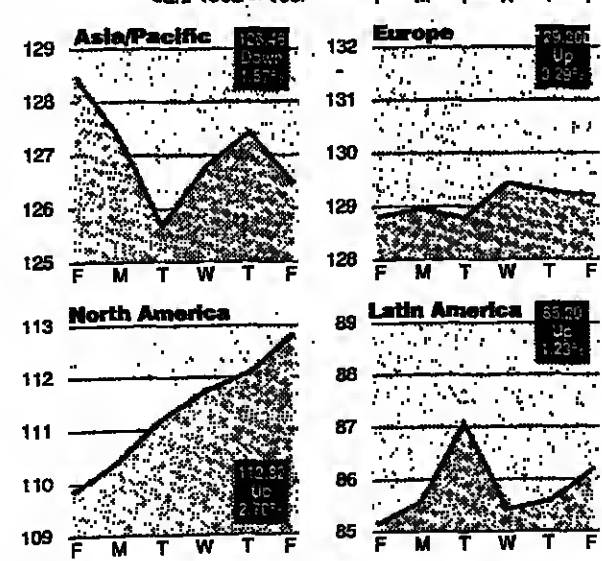

The advertising that sponsors these pages is subtle: An icon, or small picture, representing the advertiser appears on the screen. If users wish to see the ad, they simply select the icon with the mouse. This soft-sell method is becoming the Net standard for advertising.

EU to Warn 12 Members on Deficits

By Tom Buerkle
International Herald Tribune

BRUSSELS — In a sign of growing concern about Europe's ability to forge a single currency in 1999, senior monetary officials plan to deliver blunt new warnings Monday that national governments must reduce budget deficits and stay vigilant against inflation or run the risk of fresh economic upheaval.

The warnings, contained in two reports to be presented at a meeting of European Union finance ministers in Luxembourg, highlight the fact that most EU governments have made little progress at curbing their deficits over the past year despite repeated calls for major reforms, officials said.

They also reflect fears that governments, particularly the new French administration of President Jacques Chirac, might delay painful budget cuts in a bid to tackle unemployment, officials said.

The reports make clear that despite a recent political flap about how to introduce a single currency — in which Germany slammed a European Commission proposal to develop a critical mass of transactions in the new money — the question remains as to whether or not Europe can pull off monetary union.

"It's a disgrace," said a European monetary official who spoke on condition of anonymity. "We are in an economic upswing and 12 of the 15 members still could not enter into a monetary union. That's the message. That's the problem."

The first report, prepared by the secretive Monetary Committee of senior EU central bank and treasury officials, declares that Germany has joined Ireland and Luxembourg in meeting the budget criteria for a single currency, officials said. The finance ministers are expected to endorse the report.

The second report, by the Union's Economic Policy Committee, will urge a tightening of budget policy to help the other 12 member states meet the single-currency criteria, officials said. Those criteria call for annual budget deficits to be below 3 percent of gross domestic product and for outstanding national debt to be below or rapidly approaching 60 percent of GDP.

The report warns of the risk of renewed inflation in countries whose currencies have been devalued, led by Italy, Spain and Sweden, and reiterates the economic dogma enshrined in the Maastricht treaty that only low deficits and low inflation produce low interest rates and jobs.

"All these are messages clearly directed at France," the monetary official said. Mr. Chirac's prime minister, Alain Juppe, has made substantial spending promises in an effort to reduce France's 12.2 percent unemployment but has held off on tax increases and spending cuts until the summer. Drastic cuts will be needed if France is to reduce its deficit, now running at more than 5 percent of GDP, by the end of 1997, when EU leaders are to name the countries that will adopt a single currency beginning in 1999.

The finance ministers are expected to have only a brief discussion of the commission's proposal for introducing a single currency. That plan calls for most banks and governments to adopt the currency almost immediately, while consumers would wait three years to get new notes and coins. Hans Tietmeyer, president of the Bundesbank, criticized that idea last week as a burden to Germany's small banks and argued instead for the switch after a few years' delay.

Czech Media Empire Thrives on Focus

By Robert D. Gray
Special to the Herald Tribune

PRAGUE — The Bonton AS is living the emerging-market dream, having evolved from a fledgling record label into an international media conglomerate dominating much of the entertainment industry in the Czech Republic.

Today Bonton has 15 subsidiaries and more than 500 employees. The company reported revenue of 700 million koruny for 1994 and expects income of 1 billion koruny in 1995.

Bonton's activities include home-video distribution, film production and distribution, a radio station, record labels and music distribution, a chain of music and video retail outlets and an investment company.

To help finance expansion, Bonton last summer held the first international private placement in the 30-month-old republic. The company sold about 25 percent of its shares and raised 267 million koruny in the offering. Barings Bank, CS First Boston, and Beta Funds were among the buyers.

Thanks to this injection of capital, Bonton bought several former state-owned companies and increased its stake in several others.

Bonton now controls approximately 90 percent of the Czech recording industry's archives since acquiring the republic's top two classical music labels, Supraphon and Panton. Supraphon owns the lion's share of Czech classical titles and exports to 20 countries.

But it is pop music and popular culture that are largely responsible for Bonton's success. The company primarily targets the Czech youth market, whose disposable income is growing.

Bonton's focus on youth is not lost in the corporate office; rather, it stems from it. Mick Hawk and Zdenek Kozak, the company's co-presidents, are 33 and 30 years old, respectively.

"Most of our product, most of our ideas are young and are geared to the hip, young person," Mr. Hawk said. "Our company is that kind of culture — kind of laid back, fun."

Mr. Hawk said the entertainment industry and the economic environment in the Czech Republic have changed since he joined Bonton as a consultant in 1990, ten days after his graduation from the Kenan-Flagler School of Business at the University of North Carolina.

"There wasn't much strategy," he recalled. "Before it was more Wild East. I guess. Now it's more business-like."

Bonton executives say they will concentrate on their existing businesses for the rest of 1995.

Toyota May Lift Local Content of U.S.-Made Cars

By Paul Blustein
Washington Post Service

TOKYO — Japan and the United States appeared to be edging toward a breakthrough in their bitter auto trade dispute Sunday as a Japanese newspaper reported that Toyota Motor Corp., Japan's leading automaker, is preparing to unveil a plan to increase the percentage of locally made car parts used at its U.S. factories.

The report in the Nihon Keizai Shimbun, Japan's leading financial daily, said that Toyota's decision was not final, and U.S. officials warned that many tricky issues remained to be settled.

A Toyota spokesman refused to confirm or deny the report, calling it "just speculation."

But the development is the clearest sign yet that Tokyo and Washington are making progress toward resolving the most contentious issue in the auto spat, which concerns the U.S. demand for Japanese automakers to issue new "voluntary" foreign parts-purchasing plans.

Both Japanese trade negotiators and auto companies have rejected such plans as against the principles of free trade.

But with the Clinton administration vowing to slap punitive tariffs on 13 models of Japanese luxury cars starting June 28, Toyota is apparently considering changing its tune.

If Toyota does decide to issue a plan, it would mark a huge step toward settling the auto dispute, which many trade specialists have warned could lead to a serious trade war.

U.S. and Japanese negotiators are scheduled to meet in Geneva this week in an effort to beat the June 28 deadline.

One major question surrounding the chances for a settlement concerns whether or not the Ministry of International Trade and Industry will use its bureaucratic power to stop Toyota and other companies from issuing parts-purchasing plans.

The ministry has taken a very tough position against the companies issuing new plans because Washington tended to view previous plans as binding targets. But the agency may not be able to stop the companies from taking a step that they view as essential to maintaining their position in their most important overseas market.

Although recent developments suggest that the Japanese side is giving ground, the question of which side extracted the most concessions cannot be answered until an agreement is reached and the companies' plans can be examined.

Opium Firm Plans to Go Public

LONDON — The descendant of a company that once supplied Queen Victoria with a tincture of opium is about to float its shares on London's stock market.

Nowadays, heroin and cocaine are usually associated with gun-toting drug lords and sordid crack dens rather than royalty, but for a British firm called Meconic PLC, legal dealing in such substances constitutes a profitable niche market.

Meconic is one of the few companies in the world to have a license for trading in opiates and other controlled drugs, which are supplied to the pharmaceutical industry to turn into medicines, usually painkillers.

The company dominates its field with more than 20 percent of the global market, and later this month its shares will begin to trade in a move aimed at raising $17.5 million ($28.1 million).

"It's not a big market, but we do have the largest share in it," said Marshall Smalley, Meconic's managing director. Mr. Smalley estimates the official world market for controlled drugs, of which the vast majority are opiates, at about £100 million.

Mindful of the violence and social ills associated with the illegal drug trade, Meconic operates in one of the world's most tightly regulated markets.

Strict quotas, agreed more than a year in advance, govern the amount of opium poppies grown and also the orders for drugs in which the resulting opiates will be used. The Vienna-based International Narcotics Control Board regulates the quotas and makes sure the sums add up.

Meconic snaps up about a fifth of the world's legal opium poppy crop and turns it into ingredients for drugs ranging from headache pills to pellets designed to stun charging rhinos.

The company makes about 200 kilograms (440 pounds) of medical heroin a year, as well as a much smaller amount of cocaine, which is used to treat facial pain. Larger amounts of more common opiates, such as codeine and morphine, form the core of the business.

These products are then sold to 69 countries worldwide. Despite the tight rules governing the market, Mr. Smalley says the number of consumer countries is steadily expanding.

NEWSPAPER: Publishers Use Internet to Reach Readers Worldwide

ing, after years of debate on whether commercials should have a place on the Internet.

Advertising also is contributing to an explosion in the growth of on-line newspapers. Steve Outing, a newspaper consultant, says the number of publications with on-line services increased fivefold between 1993 and 1994, to 100. He estimates there will be a total of 500 by the end of this year and 2,000 in two years.

The Washington Post's on-line service, Digital Ink, due later this summer, will provide full text of all Post stories, news and information that is not published in the paper, and access to Post archives back to 1986.

Although traditional newspapers may compete tooth and nail, on-line newspapers seem to be following the courtly rules of etiquette. It is not unusual, for example, to find lists of other newspapers available on the Net on the site of a paper that is itself on the Net.

To find out if your hometown newspaper is accessible on the Net, the best place to start is at one of the many media lists compiled by aficionados.

Steve Outing maintains a good international list, the most detailed in terms of giving information about what each newspaper is offering, at: <http://marketplace.com/80/e-papers.list/www>.

Internet access to many newspapers, including the International Herald Tribune, is limited to electronic-mail correspondence with readers. The IHT plans to have an active Web site later this year.

Bundesbank Sees Economy Slowing

Frankfurt — The Bundesbank said Sunday that high wage rises and the strong Deutsche mark would slow German economic growth this year. But the central bank warned against exaggerating the impact of currency market turbulence on exports.

"We do not expect the economy to collapse, but there will be a slowdown," the Bundesbank said in its June report. "The combination of high wage increases and the mark's rise is causing a considerable burden, which can hardly be absorbed in still low profit margins."

The Bundesbank said the overall economic environment since it cut its key lending rate March 30 encourages it to maintain its current monetary policies.

Wage increases in Germany's key industrial sectors were around 4 percent this year, while the mark has appreciated almost 10 percent against the dollar since January.

But the Bundesbank cautioned against excessive gloom on exports, despite a research institute report that showed an initial sharp drop in expectations at Germany's exporters.

"It can be assumed that these responses rather reflected the first shock reactions of companies to the significant changes on the currency side," the report said.

After a more sober appraisal of the burdens and advantages, the deterioration of export expectations could turn out to be exaggerated, particularly since the foreign currency fluctuations had partly been corrected, the Bundesbank said.

The Bundesbank also said the reduction in March of its discount rate, the lowest rate at which it lends to banks, to 4 percent from 4.5 percent was due primarily to the weak growth in money supply.

The action also took into account the mark's strength against other currencies, the Bundesbank said.

Daimler Forecasts Sales

Manfred Gentz, chief financial officer of Daimler-Benz AG, said he expected 1995 sales to reach about 105 billion Deutsche marks ($75 billion), even as the strong mark continues to "impair the outlook," Bloomberg Business News reported from Stuttgart.

U.S. / SHORT COVER

Poland Pares List of Firms to be Sold

WARSAW (Reuters) — The number of companies earmarked for Poland's mass privatization program has shrunk to 414 from the initially planned 444 but at least another 100 companies could be added to the program later in the year, the PAP news agency said.

The government had to exclude some companies from the program because of their financial situation or because it had lost a controlling stake in some of them, the agency quoted Roman Galinski, a privatization ministry official, as saying.

The government is in contact with 340 companies from which it will choose at least 100 to be added to the program this year, Mr. Galinski was quoted as saying.

Taiwan To Ease Investment Rule

TAIPEI (Reuters) — The governor of Taiwan's central bank, Shou Yuan-dong, said Sunday he had agreed to end a requirement that foreign equity funds invest at least 75 percent of the money they send to Taiwan within three months of their doing so.

The central bank currently can take uninvested funds up to the 75 percent level and put them on account without paying interest. "This rule is not reasonable, so I agree to abolish it," Mr. Shou told a business association meeting. He did not say when the bank would abolish the rule.

Indian Phone Unions Call a Strike

NEW DELHI (Combined Dispatches) — Three major unions of Indian telecommunication employees have called an indefinite strike starting Monday against government moves to open the industry to the private sector, the unions said Sunday.

Talks between union leaders and officials of the national phone company continued through the weekend to try to reach a settlement to avert the strike, which could disrupt service throughout the country.

The unions said the strike, the second in a year, will jam telecommunications across India until the government retreats its moves, which, they say, would dilute its stake in the previously insulated sector.

IOC Reverses Its Field, Letting Samaranch Run

BUDAPEST — The International Olympic Committee performed a gold medal flip on Sunday and voted to hand IOC President Juan Antonio Samaranch the chance for a fourth term in office.

Only three days after Samaranch suffered a stinging defeat over plans to scrap an age limit of 75, the Spaniard's closest IOC allies whipped up support for an age limit of 80 that could keep him in power until 2001.

Under the old rules, the 74-year-old president would have had to retire in 1997 at the end of his current term.

But Samaranch said he would make no decision on whether to run again until after next year's Atlanta Games and promised rivals seven or eight months to campaign against him.

"Now I have the possibility to run again in 1997, but I know my age and I'll make the final decision at the end of next year," Samaranch said at the end of a week of IOC meetings.

"I have to be very frank with you, but I enjoy very much what I am doing," he added.

Supporters of the age limit had warned that a change just to keep Samaranch in power could make the IOC "laughing stocks." But they were forced to retreat after a group of Samaranch's supporters collected signatures from 70 of 95 IOC members supporting a higher limit.

The group, which included Primo Nebiolo, president of the International Amateur Athletic Federation, and Joao Havelange, head of FIFA, proposed a floating age limit of 75 to 80.

The petition was handed to the IOC's executive board, which decided to put a straight age limit of 80 on the agenda of the last morning's meeting.

Procedurally, the petition worked because members had voted on Thursday to change the age limit, although none of three options were backed by the two-thirds majority needed to change the Olympic Charter.

While voting on Thursday, Samaranch brushed aside calls for a similar ballot on Sunday and asked for a show of hands.

Ten members, mostly Europeans and North Americans, voted against, two abstained and the remaining 74 — who never needed to raise their hands — supported the motion.

Samaranch conceded it had been a mistake to give the IOC a choice in the earlier debate. "If we have something to vote on in the future, we will present only one option," he said.

Samaranch, right, with an IOC official in Budapest.

Dick Pound of Canada, a leading IOC member seen as a possible successor to Samaranch, confirmed he was among those who voted against. Others were said to include Princess Nora of Liechtenstein and Germany's Walther Tröger.

In its final session, the IOC also voted in 11 new members, including Jean-Claude Killy, the former French skier and co-president of the 1992 Albertville Winter Games, and the South African anti-apartheid campaigner Sam Ramsamy.

Australian Kevin Gosper was elected to the executive board.

An IAAF change designed to allow Michael Johnson's attempt at a unique Olympic double next year appeared to founder when the U.S. sprinter said the new timetable was still not suitable.

Nebiolo said Saturday that the 200 semifinals on the sixth day of the Games' athletics program had been moved back from 6:50 P.M. to 6:30 while the 400 final would now be staged at 9:05 instead of 8:30.

"If he runs backward he could still do it," Nebiolo said of Johnson. "The schedule is very good for him."

Nebiolo added: "I wrote to him. He is tranquil. The schedule is good and he could be the hero of the athletics in Atlanta."

But Johnson, who is aiming to become the first man to win world titles in both events in Gothenburg this August, said he would only attempt the double in Atlanta if he had completed the 400 final before starting the 200 preliminary rounds.

"This is not what I'm looking for," Johnson said. "I would have to finish all four rounds of the 400 before I started the 200. If that isn't done then I can't do it."

McLaren Wins At Le Mans as Andreotti Is 2d

LE MANS, France — A McLaren BMW F1 GTR held off a charging finish by a Courage-Porsche to win the Le Mans 24 Hours race Sunday by less than a lap.

Yannick Dalmas of France, J.J. Lehto of Finland and Massimiliano Sestini of Italy drove the winning McLaren to spoil Mario Andreotti's chance to gain a rare auto-racing triple.

The Courage-Porsche C34 of Andreotti and the Frenchmen Bob Wollek and Eric Hélary finished less than three minutes behind, with Wollek driving. They lost 30 minutes for repairs in the pits following an accident by Andreotti at the four-hour mark.

After losing six laps for repairs, the Courage-Porsche made steady progress throughout the next 20 hours. But time ran out and Andreotti failed to become the only driver besides the late Graham Hill to win the Formula One Championship, the Indianapolis 500 and Le Mans.

Another McLaren BMW F1 GTR, with Andy Wallace and the father-son team of Derek and Justin Bell of Britain, took third, losing the lead with less than two hours remaining after gear problems slowed it.

The winner covered 298 laps or 4,052.8 kilometers (2,518.8 miles) on the 13.6-kilometer circuit as rain slowed the speeds.

It's a bad amateur ideal to punish a team for bad behavior, but such ideals surely are irrelevant when tournament officials are admittedly deciding to play on (despite the weather) because of worldwide TV schedules, local hotel bookings and the enormous numbers of spectators planning to jet out that night who couldn't have stayed for the following day. It's the fifth-largest sporting event in the world, not some local derby. One more outburst from low pressure system, forcing the referee to abandon the match, could have dismissed South Africa from its own tournament — and then what in this divided, edgy country?

The magnificent Thierry Lacroix, who made all but one of his penalties (finishing with 104 points, one short of the World Cup record of Scotland's Gavin Hastings), put France behind by just 10-6 at the half.

mark. (2) Ford's "But it wouldn't be the Best-Selling Truck 16 years running if it wasn't built Ford Tough!" suggests to subjunctive fans that Fords are not built Ford tough: should be "if it *were*n't." Those car windows are befogged by (3) Windex, which offers: "How to make a room smell like the windows are always open." When a whole clause — subject and verb — follows the conjunction, like is incorrect; it should be as or if. In this case, it should be as if: "How to make a room smell as if the windows (hold it — you are now in the subjunctive, because the windows are not really always open) were always open."

The fiercely glaring eyes over the bulbous nose of J. Pierpont himself deploring the practices of various spellers Bloobie to the banking house of J.P. Morgan for "You've just come into a sizeable sum of money." In American English, the preferred spelling is sizeable, no e.

The compounded abuse of sentence fragments Bloopie to Kotex Security Tampons. "Smooth and simple outside. Conforms to your body inside." Remember the fumble rule: No sentence fragments. But if you are impelled to leave your sentences in shards, at least observe the rule for parallel construction. "Smooth and simple outside" doesn't have a verb, while "Conforms to your body inside" does. If you began the first one with the verb Stays, the two fragments would be parallel.

The Unfallpeople Bloopie bestowed by dozens of Gotchal gangsters to an errant language maven for an o-solecism mio: "Recently I was reading, and disagreeing, with a New York Times editorial about standards for teaching history."

Shows how important a comma can be. The first comma is fine, beginning the separation of a verb and its object by a parenthetical phrase. The trouble with the second comma is its placement. With belongs in the parenthetical phrase with disagreeing; as it now reads, removing that phrase would leave "I was reading with a New York Times editorial."

Change that to "Recently I was reading, and disagreeing with, . . ." Copywriters can feel free to read, and disagree with, the strictures herein, but the complainers don't get to put a Bloopie on their mantel.

POSTCARD

Passionate Golfers No Longer Curse the Dark

By Peter Marks
New York Times Service

DEEPER PARK, New York — It was 11:48 P.M., and James Escalona did not know where his golf ball was.

Moments before, he had rocketed his tee shot into the pitch black sky above the Heather Golf Park, a golf course dedicated to the proposition that some golfers are so hopelessly in love with the sport that they will even play in dead of night.

And so they do, hour after hour, four-some after four-some, at what its owners say is the East Coast's only all-night golf course, which opened last month.

They tee off by the light of the moon and dozens of high-intensity lamps, and many of them end up, like Escalona, poking their 5-irons in the rough at ungodly hours, combing the ground for balls enveloped in a new kind of course hazard: the dark.

The impediment fades few of the diehards who come out today on the lobster shift. "The average golfer is nuts," said David Wolkoff, who owns the new course with his father and brother. "If they have to, they will play naked in the snow."

Heartland, a nine-hole course of par-3 holes, is not just another place to swing a club. It is a grass-covered monument to an obsession, a reflection of the endless quest by golfers for a course that not only offers a challenging round, but a wait to tee off that does not take longer than the game itself.

Island, as in many affluent suburbs, is that the supply of courses has not kept up with the demand, and the wait to play, particularly on weekends at the public courses, can be hours.

And while Long Island has the kind of flat topography and the legions of golf fans that golf-course developers crave, the amount of open space available for new construction is limited. As a result, getting onto one of Long Island's more than 300 public courses on a Saturday can be as tough as finding a parking space in a Long Island shopping mall on Christmas Eve.

"In Suffolk County, we have 30,000 people who look to make reservations for ice-off times every weekend, and there are only 2,800 starting times," said Edward Wankel, a state parks official responsible for overseeing 23 state golf courses.

To cut the legendary waiting times at Bethpage — some golfers have been known to camp out overnight so they can tee off early — Wankel has just introduced a telephone reservation system for the courses.

Michael Horowitz, a metal distributor from Lido Beach, likes to play early on the public course down the block from his house, So he sets his alarm for 3 A.M., walks to the course, leaves his name on a sign-up sheet with the volunteer at the front gates and returns home to nap before teeing off at 6 or 7 A.M.

"If you want to play early, that is how you have to do it," Horowitz said.
